tioned the revolution but said it seemed to be a family affair that did not trouble many people. The Brookes have leased a pretentious residence in Portland and secured several bits of old mahogany furnishings for it in their travels. The Wakefield Bakers also spent revolution week in Mexico but they thought so little about it that no reassuring letters or telegrams were sent to relatives in this city, which caused a few days' concern for their welfare.

An Army Bluestocking

Mrs. Tasker L. Bliss, the wife of General Bliss, has the enviable reputation of being one of the most intellectual women in the army and has been dubbed the "bas bleu of Fort Mason." She has a well selected library which is boxed and shipped wherever the exigencies of military duty send General Bliss. The Blisses are related to Mrs. William R. Smedburg who also takes high rank among our none too large number of bluestockings.

A Talented Native

A wonderful girl is Cecil Cowles, the pianiste who gave a recital at Century Hall last week. Though passed the child prodigy stage, she is not out of her teens, yet her art has many of the characteristics of maturity. Of this girl San Francisco may some day have reason to be proud, for it was here that she was trained and developed. No foreign conservatory study did she have. To Professor Mansfeldt is she indebted for all that she knows of the piano. To be sure she is gifted with temperament and power of expression, but she has studied to such good purpose that the intricacies of her chosen instrument do not exist for her. At her concert she played a long and difficult and varied program with the utmost ease, one might almost say, with the assurance of extreme youth, which impresses one as a characteristic of her girlish manner. Miss Cowles is also a composer. So far her work is notable mainly for its fascinating floridness which she dashes off with tantalizing ease. From a girl of seventeen, of course one does not expect the chord of sorrow, or the soul-weary diminuendo of tragedy, or the delicate legato of profound thought. One wonders what this girl of seventeen will be at twenty-seven. She certainly gives promise of a brilliant future.

Monde and Demi-monde at the Horse Show

New Yorkers found at their recent Horse Show indications of the changed conditions of metropolitan social life and its increasing adoption of European complacency. It was remarked that while American women are still prohibited the cigarette in the fashionable resorts, the existence of a certain element in the community, and of the presence of the members of the oldest profession, even in modish places is coming now to be recognized more and more, and not only tolerated but expected. At the Horse Show was this particularly noticed. The presence in former years of rich vulgarians, or of some nouveaux riches from the Western cities, in prominent boxes at the Garden excited snobbish and other comment, both in public and private, but this year the past week was the first in the history of the Show when gorgeously begowned and bejewelled women of the half world held open court, at it were, in several of the best-located boxes, and when the men of their acquaintance did not (seemingly) hesitate either to stop and exchange greetings with these modern Aspasias, or actually to accept invitations to step up and chat for a time with them. The society scribes of the New York dailies must have been aware of the identity and history of at least two of the women at the Show who were also conspicuous at the opera in certain boxes—and yet with many adjectives they described their gowns and jewels in their journals. It could hardly be expected that New York would always see the cocotte, or the woman who answers to the cocotte of Paris, exiled from the public meeting places of society, but the appearance of this element at the Horse Show and the opera, and so conspicuously, all of a sudden, surprises many observers. They have been gossiping about various cases. One of the women at the Horse Show, who has been successively the mistress of three well-known New Yorkers, two married and one a bachelor in the past six years, but who is said to have been married recently, was seen talking with one of her former protectors at the Show, while her husband sat complacently by her side, after a cordial introduction to his predecessor. It is being said that the American cocotte, who evidently has now come into her own, and who will hereafter have to be reckoned with even by the puritanical element as an inevitable entity in all places of so-called fashionable milieu, has made her public entry and won recognition possible by good dressing and quiet behavior. She has learned her lesson abroad, and is as well, if not better behaved, and even more presentable than her sister of place and position.

Two Big Successes

Great Success of "The Dollar Mark"

"The Dollar Mark" is announced to remain one more week at the Alcazar and no surprise will be occasioned if that announcement is repeated seven days hence, for the play is scoring one of the most pronounced hits in Alcazar history. Since its first presentation in the Sutter-street theater the nightly attendance has steadily increased, and before the doors were opened for the matinee performances every seat was sold. For this agreeable condition of affairs both the play and the company are responsible, for each is entirely worthy of the other. It was a foregone conclusion that the author of "The Man of the Hour" had provided the actors with a splendid vehicle and it remained for them to enhance its worth. That they have done so is shown by the applause that so frequently interrupts the action on the stage. Every one of the brilliant lines is read so as to bring out its full value, and every opportunity for introducing effective "business" is utilized. The staging leaves nothing to be desired. Each of the four acts is set in a picture that combines artistry and elaborateness.

Another Big Dill Success

That "Dream City" is easily the most popular offering thus far of the Max Dill season at the Garrick has been evidenced by the crowded houses that the delightful musical comedy has been attracting. The general judgment is that this attractive entertainment shows the corpulent comedian at his funniest. His work makes for a continuous fund of laughter. Victor Herbert never wrote any more tuneful numbers than are to be found in "Dream City." They are of the catchy variety that one whistles as one leaves the theater and several have caught the town already. Edgar Smith's libretto is bright throughout and his lines are possessed of snap and sparkle. "Dream City" is a musical comedy with a definite plot. The sensation of the production is the aeroplane number of the second act in which a brilliantly illuminated airship is disclosed high above the stage. From her airy porch Lora Lieb throws carnations into the audience while singing "Take Me Up With You, Dearie." Miss Lieb is again as sartorially stunning as in former productions, if not a little more so.

A Russian Reconciliation

All the town has heard how the little tiff between Anna Pavlowa and Mikail Mordkin came near spoiling their week at the Valencia Theater. Happily the two wonderful dancers became reconciled after the first night's disappointment and the week proved a great artistic and financial success. But the story of their reconciliation still remains to be told. It took place in Mordkin's dressing room between dances. Picture the Pavlowa gliding in with charity in her heart and the blush of sorrow on her lovely face. Picture her bending over the unprepared Mordkin and imprinting a Russian kiss of forgiveness on his brow. 'Tis a pleasant picture, but incomplete; for at this psychological moment Bronislava Pajitzkaia who in private life is the helpmate of Mordkin, entered the dressing room and witnessing the buss of mutual forgiveness, uttered a piercing shriek, fled the room and left the two great dancers to complete the reconstruction of their broken friendship.

Lillian Russell at the Columbia

By Theodore Bonnet

Some years ago it was taken for granted that Lillian Russell couldn't act. Nobody knew why it was taken for granted, but it was probably because of her great beauty. Many persons take it for granted that women are subject to the inexorable laws of compensation, and assume that whereas the absence of physical charms, as in the case of Madame de Stael, is offset by graces of a supple mind, a woman to whom the gods have been generous in the matter of beauty must necessarily have a limited supply of gray matter. This is quite as absurd as the superstition about blondes and brunettes that once had a firm hold on the mind of men, the superstition that all the graces that are worth while are to be found only in those women whose eyes are lustrous as the black agate of Althura, and whose hair is hued like the clustering grapes of Persia. We have come to know that this is a fallacy, that there is as much mischief in blue eyes as black, as much soulfulness and passion in one color scheme as in another. There are no hard-and-fast dogmas about woman. Temperament nor talent is to be inferred from complexion. And moreover women may have both temperament and talent, be they beautiful as the Queen of Sheba or as plain as the passionate Sappho. And so it was really unjust to the airy, fairy Lillian to assume that because she was as fair to look upon as the damsels beloved of the sons of Apollo, she was without mimetic ability. How unjust it was we now know, for the days of gorgeous comic operatic productions are gone, and the famous beauty of La Cigale and The Mountebank is proving to us that she has considerable talent for the scenic art. Lillian Russell is renewing the traditions of the stage. She is following in the footsteps of many a prima donna from Aimee to Sadie Martinot, and she is making as good as the best of them. And though long ago she reached that happy altitude where she quened it over criticism, the critics are now taking her seriously as she deserves to be, and bestowing encomiums on her performances that doubtless are far more grateful to her than their former rhapsodies on her beauty. For years Lillian Russell was handicapped by her beauty. It so dazzled the critics that they could see nothing else. Now, while all women like to be beautiful, no woman is satisfied with being merely that. So it may be said of Lillian Russell that at length she has come into her own in despite her beauty. Also in despite "In Search of a Sinner," the comedy in which she is working most industriously at the Columbia. She succeeds in making the performance worth while and not every comedienne can do as much. "In Search of a Sinner" is a patchwork play, the patches of which have not been put together neatly. The author tells her story in a most clumsy manner. She is neither logical nor consistent. She introduces us to a vaudeville actress who is very funny, but who is very much out of drawing. This actress by reason of her relations with other characters in the piece renders the story harshly incongruous. In this particular comedy, figuring as she does as an object of interest to certain men without rendering the men objects of disgust to the women, she is both incredible and impossible.

Stage

Three Good Numbers at the Orpheum

There were three good numbers at the Orpheum this week. The others trailed away from indifferent to bad. This need not surprise us and does not supply a text for criticism of the Orpheum management. The Orpheum year is nearly ended. The Orpheum Road Show is almost due. With the coming of the Road Show we shall get the pick of the world's vaudeville and we shall appreciate its fatness the more after a lean week or two. So let us be thankful for what is good at the Orpheum this week and not too intolerant of what is less than good. Of the good acts the Sisters Meredith pleased me best. These two young women are not ravishing beauties, but they are nicely built on clean lines and they have a song offering full of daintiness and beauty. Their team work shows the perfection of training and their musical method suggests the influence of the London music halls, which is far from being a bad influence. To hear them sing "The Old Grey Bonnet" is to want to hear them sing it again. Next to the Meredith Sisters came the Duffin-Redcay Troupe of "casting" acrobats. These fine gymnasts of the horizontal bar do two feats that I do not remember ever having seen before in vaudeville: a triple somersault and a "loop the loop" of the most sensational description. Splendidly muscled men are these performers and it is a joy to watch them. Their act would lose nothing if the youngster were eliminated. Third in the list of good things comes a sketch called "The Mallet's Masterpiece" with Mr. William Farnum in the principal role. The sketch is written in unnecessary blank verse and the lines are unnecessarily high flown; but the idea is a pretty one—a romantic explanation of the manner in which the Venus de Milo lost her arms. Mr. Farnum is announced as a former Ben Hur, an incident in his career which should not be held against him. He is good looking and graceful, possesses a good voice and actually looks well in the Dorian chiton, something which cannot be said of Raymond Duncan. Miss Olive White who is his principal support makes a rosy Greek maiden. I cannot imagine how James Callahan and Jenny St. George ever broke into the Orpheum. Miss St. George is about two hundred and fifty pounds of girly-girlishness. Mr. Callahan would never have passed Castle Garden if he came to "Ameriky" in the clothes he wears on the stage; yet he is billed as the "natural Irishman." God help Ireland! He looks more like an Irish "natural." Of the Temple Quartette, only this—if singing were an infectious complaint I shouldn't care to listen to their tenor. The Six Musical Cuttys included a couple of young ladies who were so sweet-mannered that they won the greatest applause of the evening. The leader is to be thanked for giving us the phrase, "latest popular classic." I never heard three misfit words in such delicious juxtaposition. If you put these three words in a bag they would fight like Kilkenny cats. They announced "Songs That Will Never Die" and tortured them to death. "Radiant" Radie Furman is an imitation Vesta Victoria who deceives nobody. She comes from Drury Lane which was recently burned down, but it is safe to say that she set neither Drury Lane nor the Thames on fire. —Edward F. O'Day.

"The Kissing Girl" at the Savoy

This Saturday afternoon and evening will witness the farewell appearances of De Wolf Hopper in "A Matinee Idol" at the Savoy and on Sunday night the latest Viennese comic opera, "The Kissing Girl," by Stanislaus Strange and Harry von Tilzer, will begin a week's engagement. John P. Slocum promises a rendition of surpassing beauty with the entire original production as used in the Chicago presentation at the Cort Theater during its long run there. The title role has been allotted to Miss Texas Guinan who was here last year in "The Gay Musician." An old San Francisco favorite, Harry Hermesen, will appear as Hippocrates Muller, a German brewer, and Clara Farma, a coloratura prima donna, Ida Fitzhugh, an eccentric comedienne and a dozen other principals will appear with an ensemble of seventy. The costumes and scenery are described as being most beautiful.

The De Gogorza Concerts

Emilio De Gogorza, the Spanish baritone who first visited us as a member of the Emma Eames Concert Company and who is now one of the favorite artists of our San Francisco music lovers, is announced for two Sunday afternoon recitals at the Columbia, the dates being December 11 and 18. Mr. Robert Schmitz will be the assisting pianist and will play some quite novel French compositions in addition to standard works. The opening program will consist of four long groups of songs, the first being devoted to old works of Gluck and Cesti; the second to modern songs of Brahms, Tschaikowsky, Rubinstein and Richard Strauss; the third to modern French composers, such as Faure, Caesar Franck and Koechlin; while the final group will consist of songs in English, among which will be Hammond's "Ballad of the Bony Fiddler" and Tours' setting of Rudyard Kipling's "Mother o' Mine." An entirely different program will be given at the second concert on Sunday afternoon, the 18th.

MURIEL HOPE

Another Week of Lillian Russell

Miss Lillian Russell's engagement at the Columbia will continue throughout this and next week including Sunday nights. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday. Of the many plays successfully offered here last season none will be more pleasantly remembered than Margaret Mayo's story of life under the big tents, "Polly of the Circus." Ida St. Leon who triumphed so signally as Polly when the play was seen here last year will again essay the role. With her in the cast will be a long line of well known players. Frederic Thompson will send the same elaborate and spectacular production seen here before. This attraction follows Miss Russell.

The Tetrazzini Concerts

Manager Will Greenbaum announces that the Tetrazzini concerts will have to be postponed for a few days on account of the legal entanglements in New York. "Doc" Leahy wires that everything will be definitely settled within a few days. In the meantime the mail orders will be held until definite information warrants proceeding with the concerts. If any are dissatisfied, their money will be refunded. Full information will be given out within the next three days.

Mabel Hite and Mike Donlin at the Orpheum

Mabel Hite, one of America's favorite comedienne, and her husband Mike Donlin, the famous ball player, will appear at the Orpheum next week in Vincent Bryan's musical skit "Double Play." It is said to be a capital vehicle for these two clever entertainers. James Cook and John Lorenz are back again in vaudeville with an amusing offering of song and dialogue called "The Two Millionaires." Richard Madrage, the latest European ventriloquist imported by the Orpheum Circuit, will make his first appearance in this city next week. Otto Scheda, the noted Polish violinist, will introduce what he calls "Paganinni's Ghost." Next week will be the last of the wonderful Duffin-Redcay Troupe, The Sisters Meredith and "Radiant" Radie Furman. It will also conclude the successful engagement of William Farnum.

Pavlowa-Mordkin to Give a Special Farewell

The Pavlowa-Mordkin company now in Los Angeles has been induced to so arrange its trip eastward to the Metropolitan that it will be possible to give an extra performance in this city this coming Sunday afternoon, December 4, at the Valencia Theater. The tremendous success of Pavlowa and Mordkin insures a packed house for this farewell program which will include the beautiful two-act ballet "Giselle," the wonderful interpretation of Rubinstein's "Valse Caprice" by Pavlowa and Mordkin and, by general request, the fascinating "Bacchanale" from "The Seasons" by Glazounow, in addition to many of the other successes on the previous programs.

"The Patriot" at Ye Liberty

After a prosperous week in "The Battle" which they present for the final times this Sunday afternoon and evening the Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will offer their patrons an opportunity of enjoying "The Patriot" on next Monday evening. It is the farce-comedy in which Willie Collier played all through last season in New York City, and is one of the few of his successes that has not yet been seen in Oakland. George Friend will have the Collier part of Sir Augustus Plantagenet Armitage, an Englishman who tries his luck at mining in Bull Frog, Nevada, and associated with him in the cast will be all of the Oakland stock favorites. After one week of "The Patriot," a new farce-comedy, "Happie of the Chorus," written by Al.

SCENE FROM "THE DOLLAR MARK" AT THE ALCAZAR THEATER

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—There has been little of interest bearing on the Wall Street situation during the recent week worthy of comment, in fact securities have worked within very narrow price limits with only a small volume of trading and in the closing two days the market was practically dead-locked. If there has been any change in the fundamental conditions of the country we might say that it has been for slight betterment though this is largely sentimental. The presence of Mr. Morgan and J. J. Hill in Washington during the recent week has given rise to many rumors on the railway rate situation which is the vital matter before the country today. The security market will be watched with interest on the return of Mr. Morgan as it is believed that his visit to the capitol has important bearing on the future. That every effort is being made by the foremost bankers and business interests of the country to maintain the integrity of the vast railway interest of the United States there is no doubt, but the outcome of this tremendous vital question before the interstate commerce commission still stands in the balance.

Wheat—The breaking of the drought in Argentine was the important development of the last week. In no other particular has the wheat situation been changed materially. The trade is going into the winter with ample available supplies of wheat and flour the world over and with an equally world-wide determination to let the seller do the walking. This disposition to buy from hand-to-mouth apparently is one of the most powerful depressing factors but it is the natural reflex and outgrowth of the high prices of the last few years. It has been found impossible in the last few months to give the prospective buyer any new frills that would incite him to take hold of the market in a vigorous way such as was frequent a year ago. World's shipments for the first five months of the present year have reached the enormous total of 276,000,000 bushels which is 40,000,000 bushels larger than last year. Lake navigation closes Wednesday at midnight. This means little to the grain trade in this country that it has not known for some time.

Corn—Corn has had considerable speculative support during the last week but nevertheless has lost ground for cash and December delivery, although holding its own for more deferred deliveries. Much of the speculative buying was based on the theory that rough weather was due which might cut down movement for a time and have a sentimental effect on speculators but the bulk of the buying was in the hope of sustaining the wheat market.

Cotton—It has been an advancing market in cotton futures all week with the best prices right at the close of the week. Sentiment has been decidedly bullish due to the numerous circular letters sent broadcast by the bull party predicting a total crop of between 11,000,000 and 11,500,000 bales. The visible supply in America shows another corresponding increase for the week compared with last year and year before last and while spinners' takings for the week are relatively large the total takings thus far for the season are still behind last year and year before last, figuring 3,116,000 vs. 3,200,000 and 3,210,000 respectively. The movement up to date is on a large scale, 563,225 bales against only 328,972 last year, and stocks at United States ports and interior towns show an increase over a year ago for the first time this season, figuring 1,625,287 against 1,606,197 bales last year. Fall River for the week were again very small totalling only about 55,000 pieces. Prices generally held firm although on a few small lots of goods sold concessions of 1-16 cent were made. Curtailment among the mills is estimated at 100,000 pieces, most of it due to the complete shutting down on last Thursday. Many looms are still idle but as a rule cloth mills are still in full operation.

Local Securities—In sympathy with general stock market conditions which prevail practically all over this country and which are not at their best for activity and fluctuations, the local market for stocks and bonds continues to be a rather dull affair. It is also noted that the recent and coming holidays are having a depressing effect on the amount of business. At the present writing, Associated Oil and the Hawaiian Sugar group are the most active. The former stock is very erratic and is fast losing its recent gains. Hawaiian sugars, on a better outlook in the industry and a higher price for raw sugar, are in some cases slowly regaining their losses. It seems to be the belief in the street that, due to their long drawn out decline, the Hawaiian sugar stocks are due for some reaction upward. Spring Valley Water seems to be pegged at as well as Pacific Gas & Electric stock and California Wine but in view of the fact that all of these issues have had a long period of advance, it is felt that it is time for a resting spot. There seems to be nothing in the local situation, speaking generally, that can have a depressing effect on the better class of stocks and bonds and it is thought that with holiday influences removed, further advances will be seen in the leading California issues on an exceedingly bright outlook for 1911.

with his plump little arms, and with her ly she feels his warm little body. "It is well t did not happen," she thinks.

"And this is not all, ma'am," Matryosha goes importuning her, as inconsequently as usual
"this is not all. It may happen that only one as and yet God cannot possibly do what he sires. We know this well. I know it because convey the messages," says Matryosha the angel, in exactly the same voice in which yesterday when her mistress sent her to the master she d to the nurse: "I know that the master is at me, because I conveyed the message."

"How often have I had to convey," says Matry-osha, "that here is a good man—for the most part a young man desirous of help that he may not commit evil deeds, may not get drunk, may not be licentious, but is anxious that vice should be pulled out of him like a splint."

"How well Matryosha is speaking," thinks the mistress.

"But he cannot possibly do this, for each must assert himself. Only exertion profits. You yourself, ma'am, gave me the tale about the black hen to read. There it is related how in return for his having saved her life, a black hen gave a man such a magic hemp-seed, that while it lay in his trouser-pocket he knew all his lessons without learning them, and how owing to this magic seed he quite gave up learning and lost his memory. He, the Father, cannot take evil out of men. And they should not ask Him to do this, but should themselves pull it out, wash it out, root it out from themselves."

"From where has she got this manner of speech?" thinks the mistress, and says:

"Still, Matryosha, you are not answering my question."

"Give me time and I will say everything," says Matryosha. "It also happens that I convey the message that a family is ruined and not by its own fault, that all are weeping and sharing a room instead of living in a comfortable house, that they even have no tea, and that they pray for help of some kind. And again He cannot possibly do as they wish for He knows that it is for their good. They do not see it but He, the Father, knows that if they lived in ease they would be jolly well spoilt!"

"That is true," thinks the lady, "but why does she express herself in such a vulgar way about God? 'Jolly well' * * * That's not at all right.
I will certainly tell her so when the proper opportunity offers."

"But it is not about that I am asking," again repeats the mother. "I ask why and wherefore did this God of yours wish to take my boy away from me?" And the mother sees her Kostia alive before her and listens to his peculiar dear childish laugh, sonorous as a bell. "Why did they take him from me? If God could have done this He is a cruel and evil God and He is altogether unnecessary and I don't want to know Him."

But what is this! Matryosha is no longer Matryosha at all, but is some kind of a completely different, new, strange, indistinct being, and this being speaks not with its mouth aloud but in some special way right within the mother's heart.

"You piteous, blind and arrogant creature," says the being, "you see your Kostia such as he was a week ago with his strong elastic little limbs and his long curling hair and his ingenuous affectionate and sensible talk. But was he always such? There was a time when you rejoiced at his pronouncing 'Mama and Baba' and distinguishing who is who; and before that you were delighted at his standing up and at his softly running with tottering steps to the chair; and yet earlier you were all delighted at his crawling about the room like a little animal; and yet before you rejoiced that he recognized persons, that he held up his little bald head with its little pal-pitating crown, and yet earlier you were delighted that he took the breast and pressed it with his toothless gums. And even before that you rejoiced that he, all red and not yet separated from you, screamed, pitifully opening his lungs. And still a year earlier, where was he when he did not exist at all? You all think that you are stationary and that you and those you love should always remain such as they are now. But you are not stationary for one minute, you all flow like a river, all fly like a stone downwards towards death, which sooner or later awaits all of you.

Then how do you not understand that if out of nothing he became what he was, then he could not have stopped and could not have remained for one minute such as he was when he died; but as out of nothing he became a suckling, out of a suckling—a child, so from a child he would have become a schoolboy, a youth, a young man, an adult, middle-aged and old. You do not know what he would have been had he remained alive.
But I do know."

Behold! the mother sees in the private room of a restaurant glaringly lighted with electricity

GEO. H. GAZLEY,
Managing Director

(once her husband had taken her to such a place) a table with the remains of supper, and she sees a stout wrinkled repulsive old man with up-curved moustaches, trying to make himself look young. He is seated deeply in a soft arm-chair and with drunken eyes voraciously staring at a depraved, painted woman with a fat bare neck, and in a drunken voice he keeps shouting out some indecent jest, evidently pleased at the approving laughter of another similar couple.

"It is not true, it is not he, it is not my Kostia!" exclaims the mother with horror looking at the nasty old man so horrible, precisely because in his gaze—in his lips—there is something peculiar reminding her of Kostia. It is well this is a dream, thinks she. Here is the true Kostia. And she sees the white little naked Kostia with his plump breast sitting in his bath roaring with laughter and kicking up his legs, she not only sees but feels him suddenly catching hold of her arm uncovered up to the elbow and kissing it and finally biting it not knowing what more he can do with the arm so dear to him.

"Yes, this is Kostia and not that dreadful old man," she says to herself. And with these words she awakes and with horror recognizes the reality from which there is no awakening.

She goes into the nursery. The nurse has already washed and dressed Kostia. With wax-like and shrunken little nose, with hollows by the nostrils, and with hair flattened down from the forehead he is lying on some elevation. Candles are burning around, and on a little table behind his head are standing white, lilac, and pink hyacinths. The nurse gets up from her chair and raising her brows and pursing her lips looks at the immovable stone-like little face turned upwards. From another door opposite the mother, Matryosha enters with her good-natured simple face and tear-marked eyes.

"How is it she told me one should not grieve and yet she has herself been crying," thinks the mother and she again turns her eyes to the body. For one moment she is struck and repelled by a dreadful resemblance between the little dead face and the face of the old man she saw in her dream, but she casts off this thought and crossing herself touches the cold little wax forehead with her warm lips, then she kisses the folded cold hands and suddenly the smell of the hyacinths appears to tell her something new about his being no longer and never more to be, and she is choked with sobs and once more kisses him on the forehead and for the first time she weeps, she weeps not with hopeless, but with submissive and contrite tears. It hurts her but she is no longer rebellious, does not complain, but knows that what has happened should have happened and is therefore good.

"It is a sin, lady, to weep," says the nurse and approaching the little corpse she wipes with a folded handkerchief the mother's tears which had fallen on Kostia's waxen forehead.—Tears will oppress his little soul. He is happy.—A sinless little angel. Had he lived who knows what might have happened?

"That is so. That is so, but still it hurts, it hurts!" says the mother.

Auto Notes

E. Oppenheimer of Sacramento accompanied by a party of friends, completed a perilous run from Sacramento to Sparks, Nev., in his Oakland 40 car. People along the road advised him not to attempt the Sierra grades, declaring that the deep fall of snow that covered them made the trip impossible. Oppenheimer however is a staunch believer in Oakland efficiency and so covering his tires with chains he undertook the climb and completed it successfully.

What is said to be one of the greatest records for tire mileage has been made by a Diamond tire on a Locomobile demonstrating car in Chicago. The Diamond covered 28,000 miles without a puncture and never had to be removed from the rim in three years' use. In five years but one change of Diamond tires was made on this car and the car's total mileage for this period of time was 58,000 miles.

W. C. Hood, sales manager of the Chalmers Motor Company, who has for the past several weeks been making his headquarters on the Pacific Coast, has just left for Detroit where he will attend the meeting of Chalmers dealers, which is to convene there soon.

E. P. Brinegar of the Pioneer Automobile Company, accompanied by Earl Anthony, Chalmers dealer in Southern California, left for Detroit on Thanksgiving Day.

G. L. Weathers, agent for the Pioneer Automobile Company in Visalia, has just paid San Francisco a visit and taken delivery of several cars for his territory.

James D. Phelan who has been autoing through Europe, reports that American-made tires are rapidly winning favor in the old country. While abroad he tried foreign manufactured tires and received very poor service. On returning to San Francisco he immediately had his Mercedes car equipped by the Weinstock Nichols Co. with Morgan & Wright Nobby Treads.

Keeping up their record for consistency the two Lozier entries in the big International Grand Prix race at Savannah finished fourth and fifth in a field of sixteen starters. In consideration of the fact that the fastest specially built racers from all corners of the world were gathered at this meet and that the Loziers were regular stock cars, this must be recognized as an exceptionally brilliant performance. The Loziers were the first stock cars to finish and also the only make with more than one contender to finish every car entered.

S. G. Chapman unloaded a shipment of six 1911 Oakland "30" roadsters recently and is now equipping them for delivery. This same type of car in the 1910 model found such a demand at the opening of last season that the factory was forced to pull them off the market until they could catch up with advance orders.

At the automobile races at Sioux City, Iowa, held October 14-15, H. A. Wetmore, Hudson dealer in that city, captured nearly all the glory of the meet. He won almost every race he went into and in one event of 10 miles gained an entire lap on all his competitors. The Hudson triumphed over everything in its class and many higher powered cars fell victims to the sturdy little car in Wetmore's hands.

Ben Olcovitch, capitalist and coffee planter, has just returned to San Francisco after a year's trip to South America. Mr. Olcovitch used a Pope-Hartford car while gone and although the South American roads are not exactly conducive to automobiling, he experienced no expense other than that for gasoline and oil. It is essential, according to his statement, that one have a car in South America on which he can depend absolutely as there is no place where repairs can be made in case of mishap. Even tires and tubes have to be sent to the United States for vulcanizing. When Mr. Olcovitch returns to South America he will take back a 1911 Pope-Hartford pony tonneau. This will make the fourth Pope-Hartford in the vicinity of Olcovitch's plantations.

By Way of Suggestion

The indications are that Governor-elect Johnson is to give us a unique administration of State affairs. From the attitude which he has already taken toward certain customs long honored in traditional observance one receives the impression that he is pregnant with innovation. Apparently, for precedent, merely as such, he has no unlawful affection, no superstitious reverence, a circumstance that argues a mind of his own, a disposition to meet situations as they arise, and, let us hope, to solve problems according to right principle. For marking out this course for himself Mr. Johnson is to be commended. There is always room for innovation. And as to precedents many of them have become barnacles on the ship of State. We do not need precedents to justify right conduct, and they are not acceptable as an excuse for what is wrong. Of course there are precedents that embalm fundamental principles; these we shall expect Mr. Johnson to respect. And perhaps we might go further and expect him in his wisdom to vindicate his policy of innovation by renovating precedents that have been long since abandoned. Innovation is only another name for renovation. Looking backward Mr. Johnson may find that the best of precedents have not always persisted. They have been found inconvenient, they have gone out of fashion, like clothes, and given way to the prevailing distraction of the moment. One of these old-time precedents has caught the fancy of Governor-elect Dix of New York, who has decided to polish it up and substitute an old lamp for a new. Perhaps Mr. Johnson may deem it prudent to innovate in the same way. The precedent to which we refer is that of letting each department of government take care of itself. Many years ago it was accepted as a fundamental principle that the three branches of our government were separate and distinct. This was regarded as one of the most vital principles of our system of government; and the normal practice was justified by precedent rooted in the very nature of things. But of late the practice has been rather in harmony with the monarchical than with the republican spirit of government. We have come to pay deference both in the national and State Governments to the principle of one man power. The Executive instead of merely recommending legislation bends the legislature to his will, sometimes by coercion, sometimes by purchasing votes with political patronage. This practice is both dishonest and dangerous. It is clearly in violation of a very important principle of our government. It is not to be denied that some good has been accomplished by whipping legislators into line, but the practice cannot be continued without injurious results. We cannot afford to encourage the Executive in the exercise by sinister means of a power that is not vested in him by the Constitution. His duties as well as those of the legislature are clearly defined, and by each those duties should be performed without interference. There is no more justification for interference between the executive and legislative branches than there is between the executive and judicial, and there is as much mischief latent in one as in the other. All of which we respectfully submit to the shrewd consideration of the Hon. Hiram Johnson. In our judgment he might well ponder the announcement of Mr. Dix of New York made by that gentleman when asked what he intended to do about the Senatorial contest: "The Legislature and the Governor are co-ordinate branches of the State Government, I believe, and I intend to be Governor and nothing more."

Cowboy Songs

John A. Lomax, a professor of the University of Texas, has made a collection of the songs of the cow punchers, which he has published, and which has drawn forth a boom letter from Colonel Roosevelt, complimenting the collector on having done something of exceeding interest to the student of literature, and containing this observation: "There is something very curious in the reproduction on this continent of essentially the conditions of ballad growth which obtained in medieval England, including, by the way, sympathy for the outlaw Jesse James, taking the place of Robin Hood." This is interesting but not luminous. It is interesting to find Colonel Roosevelt affecting the viewpoint of a student of literature and at the same time phrasing an observation in the style of the foregoing. It is also interesting to learn from Colonel Roosevelt that the medieval minstrels who celebrated the deeds of champions in peril from monsters, dragons and enchantments, and of the knights of chivalry who rendered gallant service in joust and tournament and in the tented field received their inspirations in the midst of conditions such as those that are familiar to the cow punchers of the branding pen, the roundup and the trail. Colonel Roosevelt is not luminous because he gives us but a faint suggestion of what his idea is as to the "conditions of ballad growth" in medieval England. From his allusion to Robin Hood we infer that he is laboring under the delusion that the metrical romances of the medieval period deal chiefly with outlaws and that they grew out of popular sympathy for legendary heroes who stole from the rich and gave to the poor. If so the Colonel has not been a student of literature to advantage. Nor, evidently, has he studied the cowboy to advantage. The truth is there is about as much romance among cowboys as among outlaws of the Jesse James variety. And the truth has been coming out of late, much to the regret of novelists of the Indiana and Kansas schools who would have us believe that the cowboy is an adventurous individual, of personality as picturesque as of costume. These writers have been lamenting his passing, and as a consequence there has been much discussion of the subject. According to a writer in the Topeka Capital "the real cowboys were an ignorant lot of roughnecks who had no more romance in their makeup than a like number of section hands." J. T. Botkin, who was himself a cowboy in the heyday of the cattleman, says that the cowboy was a very ordinary fellow upon whom "too much gush has been wasted." He was a good rider and that was all. He liked to pose as a bad man from Bitter Creek, but he was all bluff and bluster. In chivalry his batting average was very low. Compared with other characters of the border he was not even quick with his gun. So the cowboy of fiction is a humbug. He isn't fit to figure in a good ballad. There is as much difference between the American cowboy and the knight that delighted in the spirit of the fray when swords were aloft in siege or on the green sward, or in the midnight chamber, as there is between the legendary Roosevelt, renowned as a bronco-buster and a warrior, and the Roosevelt who has lately been suffering from paralysis of the jaw.

Paternalism of Government and Mob

A citizen of Oregon has been made sensible of the fact that the right of private judgment in this free country is something not exactly in accordance with his conception of the matter. This man is of the opinion that the earth is flat and as little turns on its axis as a telegraph pole. So obstinate is he in his heresy that he will send his children to the public school where the conviction is deep rooted that the earth is round and not stationary. He claims the right to act on his own judgment and protect his children from false teaching. But the State has disallowed the claim, and in the exercise of its parental function has sent to jail this zealous but deluded parent of inferior jurisdiction. Thus we have a concrete illustration of the emptiness of the right of private judgment. Every man has the right to hold any opinion that pleases him, but there are opinions on which men are not privileged to act. The Oregon heretic has the right to hold fast to his conviction that the earth is flat, but the laws of Oregon do not permit that conviction to act as a bar to the education of his children. In other words, in Oregon as elsewhere public opinion tyrannizes over private opinion. A man may choose to be in the wrong, but he may not inflict the consequences of his obstinacy on others. A man has a right to the opinion that an occasional jag is wholesome relaxation, but society which has a right to prevent all manner of evil can punish him for not keeping sober. Government renders to society no service more important than that of preserving the principle of the superiority of the general good to individual interests. Yet in upholding this principle Governments sometimes become absurdly and grievously paternal. That is precisely what is occurring in this country where the majority having been converted to an idol and a tyrant, is now exercising a despotic sway through the institutions of government as well as through the unorganized force of its own opinion. We do not stretch the limbs of men on instruments of torture for refusing to conform to some standard of dogma; we have none of the eternal instruments of bigotry, such as the gibbet, the knout or the thumbscrew, but these are not essential manifestations of the animating principle of tyranny. Wherever public opinion is formed by arguments other than those addressed to the understanding and the reason; wherever men are held up to public execration because of the heterodoxy of their honest sentiments; wherever moral turpitude is imputed to a man for the purpose of silencing him; wherever the veteracy of public prejudice restrains discussion by reason of threats of personal dishonour and annoyance; wherever the courts kow-tow to the mob or the journalistic coddlers of the mob; wherever the arrogance of Sabbatarianism or the fanaticism of religion curtails the decent freedom of men, there the spirit of despotism flourishes as unmistakably as it did in the empires of darkness where the ears of heretics were cropped and men were pilloried for expressing their honest convictions.

Technicalities of the Law

The Supreme Court of Oklahoma has touched a responsive chord in two great hearts that beat as one, the hearts of the preckels' twins—Editor Older and Judge Dunne. Oklahoma is not yet famous for its culture or its wisdom, but nevertheless the preckels' twins would have us believe that the Supreme Court of that wild and woolly young State as to a fountain-head of other courts should go for modernism in law pure and undefiled. The Oklahoma Tribunal is supposed to have vindicated its superior wisdom by announcing its resolution to decide cases on their merits and to take scant notice of technicalities. It is easy to understand why this resolution should appeal to the favor of both Editor Older and Judge Dunne. The expectations of each have been disappointed more than once by courts that have insisted on taking cognizance of technicalities. Judge Dunne is especially pleased with the resolution because while there remains such a thing as technicality of the law he will never be able to draw his salary as a judge except under false pretenses. Perhaps it should be explained that "technicality" is another name for "principle," and that to become a lawyer a man must first become versed in the principles of the law, just as a mechanic to become skilled in his trade must learn the principles upon which the machinery he is to handle is operated. When we speak of the technique of an art we have reference to certain principles that govern the process of performance in the art. And when we speak of the technicalities of the law we have reference to certain principles on which the science of the law is founded. Some of these principles are of such minor importance that it is not necessary to adhere to them strictly at all times, but it is the business of a judge to know in particular cases what principles are important and what principles are not. Now it is Judge Dunne's misfortune and the people's also, that he knows as little of the principles of the science which he pretends to expound as a hog does about the precession of the equinoxes. And this is not strange inasmuch as Judge Dunne was pitchforked into the judiciary by the masses who are hardly able to distinguish a judge from a handsaw. Judge Dunne abominates the principles of the law, and hence he would have every transaction among men involving mutual rights regulated, and every dispute determined, upon the abstract moral relations of each case as it arises. If this were practicable the perfection of justice might be realized. It would then be merely necessary to appoint to the bench men whose conduct is always controlled by sound judgment and a virtuous heart, great masters of reason and the power of enforcing it, men whose judgment is accompanied by the most perspicuous comprehension, whose views are directed by the wisdom of Solomon, and who are able to take in at a glance every consideration of personal right, public expediency and practical policy. In short it would only be necessary to have justice administered by peers of the Almighty. And so justice might possibly be better administered on moral than on legal principle. There are many lawyers that seem to be of this opinion, for nowadays the profession is full of lawyers who, like Judge Dunne, got in by the easiest way. The spread of education has worked wondrous changes in the legal as in all other professions. The more you spread out a body of water the more shallows you will create, and the same is true of education. Mediocrities are the shallows of the professions, and the country is full of them. The situation in San Francisco is the same as in other cities. A half century ago the bar of San Francisco was noted for its culture and its learning. Today there are not twenty-five well educated lawyers in the whole State of California. There are scores of lawyers in this city whose reading has been confined to a few text-books and such decisions as they have had to consult in the preparation of cases. These are the lawyers that abominate technicalities. They know absolutely nothing of the historical conditions out of which sprung the common law, or of the origin of those precepts that have come down to us from the days of Justinian. Their notion of the law is that it is something full of mere arbitrary quiddities, and therefore likely to be found in direct opposition to common sense. Now a man who is himself ignorant of a science is obviously better fitted to hit the fancies of men who entertain such a notion than one who thoroughly understands its rules, and therefore Judge Dunne has many admirers in our Bar Association. We are far from being unaware of the fact that there is too much hair-splitting in our courts, or that the administration of justice is far from what it should be, but we are also far from thinking that it would be better to empower the Judge Dunnes of the bench to make a special rule for each case. Our experience of the courts teaches us that most of the mischief is due rather to the power that makes the law and the trial judges that are ignorant of first principles than to the high tribunals that review cases with as much reverence for what is right because it is law as for what is law because it is right.

The Discrediting of Mrs. Piper

Owing to the recent visit of the Italian medium Eusapia Palladino to this country and the more recent assertions of mediums that they have received spirit messages from the late Professor William James, the pragmatic philosopher who before death announced his intention of trying to send communications from beyond the grave, there has been in evidence lately unusual popular interest in spiritism. As might be expected, popular interest in so complicated a study has manifested itself principally by great credulity on the part of some and as great incredulity on the part of others; and very few outside the small body of spiritistic investigators have taken the pains to enlighten themselves further than by reading newspaper and magazine articles of the most superficial kind. Owing to the sensational nature of the experiments by which her trickery was exposed, a great many people are aware that Palladino has been unmasked; but how many are aware that the celebrated Mrs. Piper, the favorite medium of the most serious investigators of the shadow world, has also been discredited? Madame Palladino's tricks deceived the late Professor Lombroso and converted him from agnosticism to a belief in spirits, but Lombroso was not a very great scientist and betrayed a credulity not shared by men by no means so well known. Mrs. Piper, on the other hand, actually convinced a number of scientists of most respectable reputation, and to them her discrediting must be in the nature of a tragedy. It is not that Mrs. Piper has been proved a faker like Palladino. Those who have discredited her performances are still convinced of her sincerity; but that is small consolation for those who have based their belief in a spirit world on her supposed communications. The experiments which have relegated Mrs. Piper to her proper position in the world of mediums were conducted by Dr. Amy E. Tanner and Dr. G. Stanley Hall and are described in a recently published book written by Dr. Tanner under the title, "Studies in Spiritism." Their investigations were addressed to the exact condition of Mrs. Piper while in the trance state, and have corroborated what other investigators previously observed, that there is a resemblance between certain phases of mediumship and the actions of hysterical patients when hypnotized. They have found in Mrs. Piper the "stigmata" of hysteria, including extreme suggestibility and that exaggerated sensibility which scientists call hyperesthesia. They have discovered that Mrs.

Piper, while entranced and supposedly completely controlled by some spirit, retains a sub-conscious recollection of events and incidents connected with her normal, waking life. In other words there is no absolute cleavage between the spirit control and the medium. Mrs. Piper is not only the medium but also the "control"; or, to put it another way, Mrs. Piper's "control" is a secondary self which takes form in obedience to suggestibility originating partly with Mrs. Piper and partly with the sitters who attend her seances. Dr. Tanner and Dr. Hall suggested to Mrs. Piper several bogus spirits and received numerous communications from these non-existent dwellers in the world beyond. Even Mrs. Piper's chief control, the "spirit" of the late Richard Hodgson, was so deceived by these investigators that he behaved in a way the living Hodgson would never have done. Dr. Hall says: "As to the identity of Hodgson, the so-called control, he surely was not all there, and what was present of him, if anything, was not only fragmentary but incredibly stupid, oblivious and changed. Although I never met him in the flesh, yet in these sessions he always addressed me in the most familiar manner, had many totally false memories of former interviews with me and of discussions which never took place, and in a word seemed to feel just as intimate with me as Mrs. Piper in her normal state thought he used to. He recollected also everything that I pretended had passed between us." These investigations, of course, dispose of the spiritistic hypothesis so far as Mrs. Piper is concerned. Her usefulness henceforward will be confined to whatever light her performances while in the trance state may throw on the sub-conscious workings of the mind. It would be interesting to survey the mental processes through which those who have built their creed upon her will be put when they study the record of her discrediting.

The Failure of Justice

Once more there is lamentation in the press over the failure of justice. This time it is the decision of the Supreme Court in the Glass case that occasions the mood lugubrious. And as usual the pro-prosecution editors bestow their censures not on the trial court for its errors but on the Supreme Court for not finding that there was sufficient evidence to convict, and letting it go at that. These critics cannot understand why errors prejudicial to the rights of a defendant should entitle him to a new trial when the record shows that there is evidence of his guilt. It never occurs to them that perhaps if the errors had not been committed the evidence of guilt would be far from sufficient to convince a jury. In this very Glass case, it appears, Judge Lawlor admitted testimony about matters wholly foreign to the charge in the indictment. The only purpose of this testimony was to prejudice the jury against the defendant. Now is it not reasonable to ask why this irrelevant testimony was admitted? And is it not reasonable to conclude that it was admitted because the evidence bearing on the issue was deemed insufficient? This course is the truth of the matter, for the fact is that the Prosecution prosecuted the wrong man. Also the fact is that Judge Lawlor went as far as possible toward assisting the Prosecution in giving color to its theory of the bribery. Now, if as the critics of the Supreme Court say, the evidence that was admitted without error was sufficient to establish the defendant's guilt, then obviously their darling judge should receive censure from them on the score of his inanity. For if we accept their theory there was no necessity of Judge Lawlor's tugging at the law to cinch the defendant; he might have been fair and still have accomplished his purpose, thus saving the taxpayers a large sum of money. But the editors who admire Judge Lawlor admire him for his zeal, and a little excess of it now and then they are always prepared to pardon. They know that whenever he errs it is of consuming passion for sending men to jail and in the indulgence of that passion he will have their profound sympathy so long as they remain out of the prisoners' dock.

Something Doing

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Having read your interesting animadversions on the Bar Association I take the liberty to call your attention to the action of the briefless members in presenting a petition to the Superior Court to assign all probate matters to one department. If the petitioners ever had any probate business they would know that it is utterly impossible for one department to handle all probate matters. Years ago when there was much less than there is now, and one judge had the handling of all of it his calendar was clogged and business was congested to an exasperating extent. It would be interesting to learn what lawyer is behind this scheme to get his probate business before a certain judge. If the meddlesome but otherwise idle members of the bar don't watch out they'll precipitate something in the nature of a scandal.

Mangling the Truth

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: In the Call of Sunday last there is a fine specimen of that journal's characteristic distortion of fact. In an editorial the Court of Appeal is commended for deciding that one superior judge cannot set aside the order of another. "But," says the Call, "this is a rule that ought to work both ways, and to the layman not skilled in the fine distinctions of the law it seems that Judge Cabaniss, in the first instance, set aside the order of Judge Lawlor committing Ruef to jail"; also, "In the absence of enlightenment it looks to the unlearned as if Cabaniss could set Lawlor aside while Lawlor is foreclosed of power in the same relation." Now, Mr. Editor, consider how little truth there is in all this. In the first place Judge Cabaniss never set aside an order made by Judge Lawlor. Abe Ruef went to jail as a result of the automatic operation of the law. He was convicted of a felony and the judgment of the court followed as a matter of course. Then arose a new proceeding. Ruef applied for release on bail pending appeal, alleging ill-health with reference to which he introduced expert testimony. The application was made to the department of the court over which Judge Lawlor presides. Judge Lawlor was absent and Judge Cabaniss occupied Judge Lawlor's chair. Judge Cabaniss granted the petition. The only attempt at setting aside an order was that made by Judge Lawlor when he attempted to set aside the order made by Judge Cabaniss in a wholly independent and original proceeding.

The Manhandling of Judge Coffey

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I see that Judge Coffey has been appealing to public sympathy on account of his painful experience with a motorman by whom he was manhandled. From Judge Coffey's account of the affair in a bill of particulars addressed to the United Railroads, but inadvertently sent by him to the daily press, he differed with the motorman on a question of fact and was promptly made to realize the inadvisability of "talking back" when outside the jurisdiction of his own court.

"Get out of the gangway," said the motorman. "I'm not obstructing the passageway," said the little autocrat of Department 9.

Thereupon Judge Coffey was dragged a few feet by the collar. This was a terrible humiliation for him to suffer. And for him it was a strange experience. But let us hope that like good Christian he may profit from it. Now that Judge Coffey knows how it feels to be humiliated perhaps he will endeavor to be more amiable toward those humble beings that daily sit beneath his frown. Off the bench Judge Coffey is one of the most mild-mannered of men, but on the job he is the most irritable and querulous of mortals. He is a terror to young attorneys. He has a large stock of withering sarcasm which he unloads on very slight provocation. He has filled his court-room with blushes enough to burn down a whole city. Embalmed in the anecdotal bench and bar is the story of General Jim Smith's resentment on a street corner of the treatment that he received from Judge Coffey in court. The stories of Judge Coffey's manifestations of peevishness would fill a large volume. So, perhaps the motorman of whom he complains has really done him a service. The only thing really regretted about the incident is that it provoked Judge Coffey to the writing of a letter which is self-revealing. In this letter we find Judge Coffey arguing that as he was abused by a motorman therefore the United Railroads should be abused by the public. This is the style of argument one might expect from Frank Heney or E. P. E. Troy. It is the style of argument that the demagogue addresses to the mob. Now Judge Coffey is really a high-minded and sensible man. He knows that overcrowding of cars is something that can very well be avoided in populous cities. He knows that for the shortcomings of its service the United Railroads is not altogether responsible. Can it be that our fine little judge, the compromising friend of the widow and orphan, has been soured by the recent election.

Perspective Impressions

Freedom is the privilege of being responsible for oneself. Society regards this privilege as incompatible with its welfare.

Wouldn't it be funny if Judge Angelotti who ought to know all about currents should find out that he has mistaken an ebb tide for a flood?

The Examiner says "When the suffragettes began to climb roofs it is time for Mr. Asquith and other statesmen to come down." Rather does it behoove them to lower their eyes with becoming modesty.

Will any woman be able to do more with the elective franchise than Mary Baker Eddy succeeded in doing without it.

If cant is a double-distilled lie how shall we describe the eminent statesmen who vituperated Joe Cannon last year and applauded him last Monday?

A crusade has been started against cigarette smoking among university students. Isn't it more important to reduce the amount of dope that is consumed by university professors?

How about that "ovation" that Uncle Joe Cannon received from Congress last Monday? The news of it must have made the blood of every virtuous editor and of every righteous insurgent boil with indignation.

What Governor-elect Johnson did for San Francisco in Washington has not yet been revealed, but it is known that he revealed himself to the readers of a Washington paper in an interview in which he clearly differentiated the sheep and goats of politics.

Being a Brief Chronicle of Significant Events the Wide World Over.

The Stodginess of Wellesley

We are a vast lump of unassimilated, indigestible stodginess without common aim or common ambition." A frank confession, that, to come from a college paper; an amazing confession when the college in question is none other than fashionable Wellesley in Massachusetts. The feminine editor of the Wellesley college paper has been examining the college conscience and marks down numerous sins of commission and omission. It seems that the Wellesley girls look upon education as "the proper caper," "the thing," a sort of social finish, instead of regarding it in a more serious light. This is too bad. Over at the University of California, the girl who takes the severe view of education is usually called a "Pelican" or a "grind" or by some other equally contemptuous name. There is plenty of stodginess over there, but there is a lack of frankness in acknowledging it, except when Mills Gayley is busy with his spatula.

Sam Davis' Recessional

The defeat of Nelson by Moran reminds the editor of Goodwin's Weekly, Salt Lake City, of the verses perpetrated by Sam Davis after the Cons-Nelson debate at Goldfield a few years ago:

Time called; the nigger whangs away;
On nose and headpiece falls his ire,
And Nelson's face of yesterday
Is one with Nineveh and Tyre.
Pay us that hundred-dollar bet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget.

The toutings and the tumults cease,
The trainers and the pugs depart,
And they who failed to win a piece
Are troubled with a contrite heart
Their I. O. U.'s are with us yet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget.

Fred Swanton's Defi

Fred Swanton is the Augustus of Santa Cruz. He founded the municipality by the sounding of a village and intends to leave it a metropolis. Right now he is engaged in adding a big hotel to his beach attractions. But Fred Augustus Swanton is not altogether without opposition in his own country; he has his critics. These critics declare that instead of building on the shifting sands, Fred should have selected the solid rock of some proud eminence commanding a wider horizon. Fred is equal to the emergency. Not for him the indignant repudiation of criticism. Listen to Fred's sporting offer, published in the Santa Cruz Surf:

"Now that the hotel is being constructed, let some of those who have the 'hillside' idea of location get in and build another, and I'll help them promote it. What Santa Cruz wants is more hotels, so we can induce greater crowds to visit us during the months when 90 per cent of the people take their vacation."

It is somebody's move.

To Dry the Springs of Politics

Assemblyman-elect John H. Guill Jr. of Chico is a man of revolutionary tendencies. He plans the obliteration of one of our most cherished political institutions. He proposes to make it a misdemeanor for a candidate for office to placate the uncertain elector with a campaign cigar or a campaign drink. This information which I glean from the Oroville Mercury, is calculated to cast a gloom over our glorious electorate from Siskiyou to San Diego and from the Sierras to the sea, as Tom Shanahan would say. It is a barefaced attack on the stogie and steam beer industry and will appeal only to that small and selfish body made up of incumbent and prospective tax-eaters. Assemblyman Guill would dry the springs of politics. If such a reform had emanated from the thirsty south I would not be surprised, but coming from the top of the Sacramento Valley, a region for which irrigation has worked wonders, it inspires thoughts that can only be assuaged by the aid of nicotine and spirits.

The Coming Gerrymander

It is perhaps not polite to refer to the redistricting of the State which will be part of the task of the approaching Legislature as a gerrymander, but it is certainly not an unfair anticipation of what is going to take place. Down in Fresno, where Chester Rowell preaches the doctrine that one must be a Republican in order to be saved, the redistricting is already a subject of serious thought. Listen to the Fresno Republican:

"But, whatever the details of the redistricting, there will be a very definite shifting of the balance of legislative power. The change, fortunately, is in the direction both of good government and of Republican majorities. San Francisco, which now has eighteen assemblymen will only have fourteen, a loss of four. The actual improvement will be even better than this, as the majority of the fourteen will come from districts in which good government may win, while the majority now comes from districts which are hopeless. Alameda County will gain at least one, Fresno County one, and Los Angeles eight. The mountain counties of Northern California, many of which are still Democratic will have fewer districts, while the San Joaquin Valley, in addition to the one in Fresno County, will gain at least two more. There will also be other gains in Southern California, added to those in Los Angeles. It will thus be seen that, without gerrymandering, any possible reapportionment will make the California legislature even more overwhelmingly Republican than now. It would take a landslide five times as great to elect a Democratic legislature and United States Senator as it would to elect a Democratic Governor. Fortunately, it happens that the gains are also in places where militant good government has a chance, irrespective of partisanship."

A Query from Portland

The Portland Spectator, a newsy weekly paper, is very much interested in the efforts of San Francisco to obtain the Panama Canal Exposition. But the Spectator, professing to speak for the commercial interests of Portland, declares that there is a string attached to the assistance which Portland may render to make the exposition a success. There is much virtue in this "if"—

"If the money and aid which we will give are not to be used to fasten on Portland the union fetters that so cruelly wound and gall San Francisco. Portland and the other cities on the coast that are enjoying comparative freedom from union domination, before they give their money to assist in creating San Francisco's exposition, will ask if the exposition is to be built for the benefit of the closed-shop laborites. San Francisco is the coast headquarters of the closed shop. The closed-shop town means a city whose every industry is conducted by the unions for the unions, and in which no workingman who does not belong to the union can get a day's work, and in which no employer who does not truckle to the unions can stay in business."

Ask your grocer for the Italian-Swiss Colony's California grape brandy. It blends nicely with the raisins in making pies for the holidays.

Jack London Turns Dramatist

Introducing the Very Latest Motives and Experiences into a Four-act Drama of American Politics and Business Which He Calls by the Suggestive Title, "Theft"

By Edward F. O'Day

The author of "The Call of the Wild" seems to have felt the call of the footlights, for the latest work from his industrious pen bears the dramatic form. Whether London intended to write a play that could be acted has not been announced by the Macmillans, his publishers, but the fact that the work has been put between covers in advance of its production on the stage seems to speak for itself. Either London set about the composition of that out-of-date affair, a "closet drama" or else he tried to sell his play to a manager and failed. On any other theory it is difficult to explain why "Theft" should be first presented in book form.

"Theft" may be taken as Jack London's indictment of our most exalted classes. The scene is laid in Washington and the men and women who are named in Jack's true bill represent American business, American politics and American society at their wealthiest. If the indictment is faultily drawn, it is because Jack has been compelled to glean his knowledge of these "hopper suckles" from the yellow newspapers and the muckraking magazines. No doubt he thinks that in the great emergencies of life the malefactors of great wealth, their wives and daughters, behave like the people of the abyss and there would be little gain in trying to disabuse him of this thought which is rather a popular one with our parlor and kitchen socialists. But even in the thrust and parry of careless conversation Jack's Washingtonians fail to achieve that polished manner which argues, at the very least, a veneer of culture. In his "big" scenes Jack insists on falling back on the "abysmal brute," so that we are treated to the most remarkable happenings ever imagined of Washington. Imagine a daughter stripped to the skin by her angry father who is looking for "the papers"; but I anticipate.

There are three pivotal characters in "Theft"—Starkweather who controls billions of dollars and the United States Senate; Margaret Chalmers, his daughter who is married to a great United States senator and is a leader of Washington society; and Howard Knox, a congressman whose reform program is expected to hasten the coming of the millennium. It seems that Knox is going to deliver a speech in the Congress for the specific purpose of smashing the machine which controls that body and through it, the whole country. His speech would have caused alarm to Starkweather and his crowd but for one fact. They believed that he had no evidence to prove his charges and they intended, through the press of the country which they controlled, to make him a nine days' laughing stock. But on the day before the great speech is to be delivered Knox drops in to Senator Chalmers' house for a cup of tea with the charming wife and mother Margaret Chalmers and informs her that he has the proofs, "the papers." Agents of Gherst, the great newspaper proprietor, have stolen them from Starkweather's office in New York. This is only one of the many occasions when London tries to heighten the interest of his play by introducing actual incidents of recent date and the names of actual persons thinly disguised. It is a cheap expedient at best. Margaret Chalmers, having as a girl read Plato's Republic and More's Utopia, is anxious to see the world reformed and seems to hate her father's wealth as much as Knox does. She is a remarkable daughter who does not object to hearing her rich old daddy called a thief, when Knox makes the accusation. Despite her being a wife and mother she is very tender toward Knox. A sample of the dialogue in the first act in which this preliminary matter is presented may not be amiss. Capitalism and Socialism, represented by Starkweather and Knox, are arguing, not on a street corner but in a drawing room:

Starkweather—I am like a certain gentleman from Missouri. You've got to show me.

Knox—And I'm like the man from Texas. It's got to be put in my hand.

Starkweather—I shift my residence at once to Texas, etc.

Having discovered at the end of the first act that the incriminating papers which Knox needed for his speech had been stolen from his office, Starkweather commissioned Hubbard, a newspaperman in the employ of the interests, to recover them; so in the second act Hubbard with a couple of the strong-arm gentry breaks into Knox's apartment. The papers are within reach and Hubbard is hiding in Knox's bedroom when Margaret Chalmers pays Knox a visit to warn him that the stolen documents have been missed. Having done this she dismisses her maid and her son and she becomes tender. The stage directions tell us that she "slips back her cloak, revealing herself in evening gown, and looks at Knox, sumptuously, lovingly, and willingly."

Knox—(Inflamed by the sight of her.) Don't! Don't! I can't stand it. Such sight of you fills me with madness. (Margaret laughs low and triumphantly.) I don't want to think of you as a woman. I must not. Allow me. (He rises and attempts to draw cloak about her shoulders, but she resists him. Yet does he succeed in partly cloaking her.)

Margaret—I want you to see me as a woman. I want you to think of me as a woman. I want you mad for me. (She holds out her arms, the cloak slipping from them.) I want—don't you see what I want?—(Knox sinks back in chair, attempting to shield his eyes with his hands.) (Slipping cloak fully back from her again.) Look at me.

Knox—(Looking, coming to his feet, and approaching her, with extended arms, murmuring softly.) Margaret. Margaret. (Margaret rises to meet him, and they are clasped in each other's arms.) (Hubbard, peering forth through door, looks at them with an expression of cynical amusement. His gaze wanders, and he sees the documents, within arm's reach, on top of bookcase. He picks up documents, holds them to the light of stage to glance at them, and, with triumphant expression on face, disappears and closes door.)

Knox—(Holding Margaret from him and looking at her.) I love you. I do love you. But I had resolved never to speak it, never to let you know.

Margaret—Silly man. I have known long that you loved me. You have told me so often and in so many ways. You could not look at me without telling me.

Knox—You saw?

Margaret—How could I help seeing? I was a woman. Only, with your voice you never spoke a word. Sit down, there, where I may look at you, and let me tell you. I shall do the speaking now. (She urges him back into the desk-chair, and reseats herself.) (She makes as if to pull the cloak around her.) Shall I?

Knox—(Vehemently.) No, no! As you are. Let me feast my eyes upon you who are mine. I must be dreaming.

Margaret—(With a low, satisfied laugh of triumph.) Oh, you men! As of old, and a forever, you must be wooed through your senses. Did I display the wisdom of an Hypatia, the science of a Madam Curie, yet would you keep your iron control, throttling the voice of your heart with silence. But let me for a moment be Lilith, for a moment lay aside this garment constructed for the purpose of keeping out the chill of night, and on the instant you are fire and aflame, all voluble with love's desire.

Knox—(Protestingly.) Margaret! It is no fair!

Margaret—I love you—and—you?

Knox—(Fervently and reverently.) I love you. Margaret—Then listen. I have told you of my girlhood and my dreams. I wanted to do what you are so nobly doing. And I did nothing. I could do nothing. I was not permitted. All ways was I compelled to hold myself in check. It was to do what you are doing, that I married. And that, too, failed me. My husband became a henchman of the Interests, my own father's tool for the perpetuation of the evils against which I desired to fight. (She pauses.) It has been a long fight, and I have been very tired, for I always did I confront failure. My husband—did not love him. I never loved him. I sold myself for the Cause, and the cause profited nothing. (Pause.) Often, I have lost faith—faith in everything, in God and man, in the hope of any righteousness ever prevailing. But again and again, by what you are doing, have you awakened me. I came to-night with no thought of self. I came to warn you, to help the good work on. I remained—thank God!—I remained to love you—and to be loved by you. I suddenly found myself, looking at you, very weary. I wanted you—you, more than anything in the world. (She holds out her arms.) Come to me. I want you—now. (Knox, in an ecstasy, comes to her. He seats himself on the broad arm of the chair and is drawn into her arms.)

Knox—But I have been tired at times. I was very tired to-night—and you came. And now I am glad, only glad.

Margaret—I have been wanton to-night. I confess it. I am proud of it. But it was not—professional. It was the first time in my life. Almost do I regret—almost do I regret that I did not do it sooner—it has been crowned with success. You have held me in your arms—your arms. Oh, you will never know what that first embrace meant to me. I am not a clod. I am not iron nor stone. I am a woman—a warm breathing woman—. (She rises, and draws him to his feet.) Kiss me, my dear lord and love. Kiss me. (They embrace.)

Then follows a scene of renunciation, but the lovers promise never to see each other again.

The Trial by Fire

By Fr. O. Keuhne (From the German)

While Frieda was sipping her morning chocolate she kept thinking of the evening before and the idyllic their life had become again. Aunt Friederica had sat in her arm-chair; Kurt had read from a novel with his clear, charming voice; and herself had sat on a low bench at his feet and listened in rapt silence.

This evening Kurt would finish the novel. "Would they win each other at last?" she wondered. She wished it with all her heart. That was for the heroine and the hero of the romance. While her thoughts were thus running over the and other figures of the novel her eye fell upon the morning paper which was lying on the breakfast table as usual. Mechanically she drew it nearer. Directly she buried her head in it. The "Births, Deaths and Marriages" column was always of burning interest to her. Next came the story, and thirdly as well as lastly the "Miscellaneous" items. For all she cared, a newspaper need never contain more than these three departments.

In her favorite column there was nothing special this morning. The few lines of fiction were devoured in a moment. So she passed on to the miscellanies. Suddenly she started. "That is right!" She read it again:

Mrs. Weightman, of Chicago, who had arrived at the conviction that her husband had married her merely for her money, turned her whole fortune into paper money and consigned the precious notes—65,000 dollars—to the flames, before the eyes of her fathomed and unmasked lord.

Frieda glowed. "That is right! They all ought to do it!" She herself did not know how it had happened, but her thoughts were all at once with Kurt, her betrothed. "Did he, after all, want me merely for her money?" She had to laugh aloud. No, she knew him too well for that! It was most unjust of her even to think of such a thing.

Still she cut out the item and concealed it in her purse.

In the afternoon Frieda visited her dearest friend, Sidonia, in the farthest quarter of the city. She had been promising her this visit day after day for two weeks, but had never found time to fulfill the engagement until now.

Sidonia did not look so well as usual. Frieda looked at her in astonishment and inquired sympathetically whether anything was the matter. Her friend tried to ward off all inquiries. "Nothing is the matter—really nothing!" She forced herself—the dissembling was quite apparent—to put on a cheerful mask.

Both sat down tete-a-tete in the alcove. Their nimble fingers engaged in crocheting as a prelude, and soon their tongues were flying as nimbly as their fingers—especially Frieda's. They ran on from this to that, chatting of the thousand and of things that interest young ladies, particularly of confidential friends in an undisturbed entre-nous. Suddenly Frieda remembered what she had read in the morning paper about Mrs. Weightman. She began to search for the clipping. Sidonia, however, knew about it already.

Frieda paid her tribute of infinite admiration to the sharp American woman, and the latter's husband came off badly enough.

Just as she had him writhing in her talons, so to speak, a sigh escaped Sidonia, and, however much she resisted it, the floods welled to her eyes. Two great tears overflowed and rolled slowly down her cheeks.

Frieda was frightened, cast aside the clipping and her crochet-work, and threw her arms caressingly about her friend's neck. "Sidonia, what is the matter with you?"

She only sobbed: "Oh, it is so sad! That cursed money—"

It was some time before Frieda wrung from her the following confession. At a ball that Sidonia had attended the previous week a young merchant had paid court to her in a marked way. He had asked of her parents the privilege of paying her a visit. This had taken place the following day. Her father, a conscientious civil officer, had seen in him a suitor who must be taken in earnest, and wished to have all things clearly understood from the start. He had accordingly remarked in the course of a conversation that his daughter had nothing to expect except her wedding outfit. Whereupon the suitor had soon taken his leave and had never been seen or heard of since. On the one hand, Sidonia was satisfied with the result, for he had in no wise awakened her sympathy. On the other hand, his behavior had caused her great pain, made her mortally unhappy. With repressed anger she concluded: "When I think of all the ardent compliments, all the glances which could not be misunderstood! All, all was a lie—merely a base lie! It is disgraceful!"

Frieda exerted all her arts to soothe her. She should simply picture to herself the possibility that she might finally have yielded her love to the unworthy suitor, and he had then—alas, too late—forsaken her. She ought really to be quite glad that everything had been settled thus without inconvenient entanglements. Moreover, she should remember that a whole bevy of gentlemen hovered around her at every ball. Surely the right one must soon appear. Many men, she could readily believe, were worthless, calculating. But certainly not all. For example, her own Kurt.

These and similar consolations finally had their effect upon Sidonia. Frieda, noticing this, introduced other subjects of conversation. When she left she had the satisfaction of seeing her friend hold up her head again as of old.

On the way home—she walked part of the way on account of some shopping—Frieda was wholly occupied with Sidonia's experience. Without perceiving it, just as in the morning while reading the miscellaneous news, her thoughts wandered away to Kurt again. Did he really love her for her own sake alone? Might he not be secretly counting on her money—a little, just a tiny bit?

She laughed aloud, as in the morning. But this time it sounded harder. She was vexed at the very thought, vexed indeed that she had laughed at all there on the street. However, it was twilight; no one could recognize her, and her laughter attracted no further notice.

"Take one, please!" cried a man who had planted himself by the sidewalk and forced upon her, as upon every other passer-by, a small sheet of paper.

She took it mechanically. In the semi-dusk she recognized it as an advertisement.

She crumpled the paper indifferently in her hand and thrust it into her handbag. At the next corner she had to accept a similar sheet from another distributor, although she remonstrated that she already had one. Without examining it she stuffed it into the bag along with the first.

Also a third, which was forced upon her at the following corner, met the same fate, for it was simply impossible for her to throw anything away while on the street.

Having reached home, she found rest nowhere. Aunt Friederica, who was both father and mother to this orphan girl, looked at her inquiringly over her eye-glasses. "What is the matter, child? Has anything unpleasant happened to you?"

"No—no, auntie." But she suddenly fell about her neck. "Dear, good auntie, won't you tell me something, please?"

"Do not be so impetuous, child!"

"You will tell me what I should like so much to know, won't you, auntie?"

"What am I to reveal to you, then?" asked her aunt cautiously.

"Auntie, have you ever said at any time, in Kurt's presence, that I have a little fortune inherited from my parents?"

"Such a question, child!"

"But have you, auntie?"

"Hm—of course, it was when he first wooed you. I considered it my duty. Twenty thousand marks in good government notes are certainly worth mentioning."

Frieda, disappointed, withdrew her arm from her aunt's neck. "Oh, if you had not done that, auntie!"

"My child, you are talking of something you don't understand. Do you think that Kurt would have loved you less, if I had not told it?" She shook her white head. "How can such thoughts occur to you! No—no, the young girls nowadays! In our time—"

She ceased abruptly and sat musing.

But Frieda became more and more restless.

When Kurt arrived a little later her agitation attracted his notice at once. He inquired again and again, full of sympathy, after the cause, but she repelled all his questions—almost harshly.

Aunt Friederica sought to calm him. It was nothing—a girl's moods. The young ladies of today were that way. To herself, however, she thought: Here old experience is justified once more. It is never well when affianced persons see and talk with each other for hours together day in and day out. Ill humors, to which every one is subject sometimes, cloud the serenity of their intercourse. In short, the gray old commonplace of everyday life asserts itself too strongly.

Kurt left earlier than usual this evening. His parting kiss did not seem nearly so dear to Frieda as hitherto. And Kurt was of the same opinion with respect to hers.

Soon after he had gone Frieda indulged in the most passionate self-reproaches. How had she behaved toward him? Like a naughty child? And why?

She could find no satisfactory answer.

But she resolved to wipe out the disgrace of her ill-behavior. Tomorrow, as soon as he entered—

The Remarkable Brown Case

As some weeks ago I took occasion to remark that there was something which it behooved the Rev. C. R. Brown to do before he left Oakland, and as it has been done, I now take occasion to report that in a sense the slate is clean. At the same time it occurs to me that in view of all the publicity which Dr. Brown has received, and of the curious transfiguration of him at the hands of the trustees of the First Congregational Church, there are certain observations that might not be taken amiss at this time. As glorified by the trustees Dr. Brown takes on the appearance of a martyr; for we are told that he has suffered greatly as a consequence of his spiritual ministrations. And now there is much pity for him. The way of the world is to praise dead saints and persecute living ones, but Dr. Brown while being praised in the flesh seems to be destined nevertheless for a post-mortem halo. Now far be it from me to play the part of the devil's disciple in this matter. I prefer to deal with the church trustees who have not handled the case as, in my judgment, it should have been handled. In view of the fact that Dr. Brown is to continue in the ministry, and is even now a candidate for a very exalted position, the trustees should not have preoccupied themselves entirely with the interest of their church. They should have taken a very broad view of the matter. They should have been more thorough in their investigation. They should have sought not only to abate scandal but to have completely routed and humiliated the scandal-mongers. I will endeavor to show during the course of my remarks wherein they have failed to do this.

The Importance of Truth

Apparently the church trustees conceived that their only duty was to put an end to gossip, and yet they have not even done that. Rather have they whetted curiosity. Now gossip is hardly worth bothering about. It is one of the ineradicable consequences of civilization. There is nothing characteristic of human nature more saddening than its credulity touching reports of the misdemeanors of good men. The higher a man stands as a moral force in a community the more readily is ear given to imputations against his character. But all decent men will shun purveyors of injurious gossip. There is no better test of high character than reluctance to think evil of one's neighbor, than incapacity to believe evil report about a good man except on the most trustworthy testimony. And no respectable journal will give publicity to injurious gossip even on trustworthy testimony except for the public good. And, I should add, if there is one thing more deeply to be deplored than scandal touching the character of a minister of religion it is the suppression of the truth regarding a minister of religion who has exposed himself to scandal. For there is nothing more important to society than the preservation of the prestige of that holy office that has been graced by such men as Bossuet, Newman, Whitfield, Channing, Herbert and Arnold. To that end clergymen should be expected to serve as shining, spotless examples of purity and exalted character, for it is their business to exert all their power in stimulating devotion and faith, to employ all their learning in the defence of truth. And if a minister becomes the victim of injurious gossip it is not sufficient to demand that reckless tongues be stilled; if possible the groundlessness of rumor should be established beyond peradventure. This should have been done in the Brown case. It might have been done for Dr. Brown's sake.

An Unrefuted Charge

The church authorities have sent Dr. Brown forth with a clean bill of health, and he is a candidate for a position in the Carnegie Institute; nay, the distinction, I am told, has been assured him. Yet Dr. Brown is still under a cloud. The blot that has been put on him has not been effaced by the gentlemen who have pictured him as the victim of a misunderstanding. As the Chronicle has observed "the parties to the affair express the hope that the incident is closed, but it is closed without the real cause of the gossip being brought out." It is closed without even a denial of one of the most serious charges that has been brought against Dr. Brown. This is the charge of cowardice, made and iterated by Mrs. George H. Martin, who explained that Dr. Brown's cowardice was not physical but moral; that because of him she suffered from injurious gossip, and that he had not sufficient manliness to protect her name. This charge Mrs. Martin has never withdrawn. While this charge goes unrefuted Dr. Brown cannot truly be said to have been exonerated. To be a Christian minister worthy of the name a man must first be a gentleman, and to be a gentleman a man must be brave, generous and thoughtful for others.

The Disingenuousness of Him

But I am more concerned about the management of the First Congregational Church than about Dr. Brown. For Dr. Brown seems to be satisfied with a rhetorical acquittal. And therefore I will examine the record of Dr. Brown's conduct solely with a view to analyzing the mental processes of the men by whom he has been whitewashed. Let us first see whether Dr. Brown has not been at least sufficiently disingenuous to provoke distrust in the minds of reasonable men. The trustees first learned of Dr. Brown's contemplated disavowance of his relations with the First Congregational Church when the fact was announced in these columns. Shortly thereafter Dr. Brown resigned, giving as his reason that he was suffering from overwork. When interviewed he took occasion, without being questioned on the subject, to say that he was not resigning on account of trouble with any member of his congregation. At this time Mrs. George H. Martin was not a member of his congregation. A little later one of Brown's friends assured me that Dr. Brown had nothing but his nerves to worry him. This was guaranteed to be the truth but I knew that it was false. Presently the story of the scandal appeared in the Examiner, and Dr. Brown was interviewed and told that Mrs. Martin had pronounced him a coward, and he said, "There absolutely nothing in all this." According to the Examiner he was very indignant and declared he did not believe Mrs. Martin had made the statement attributed to her. Thus far, it is clear that God's minister was somewhat disingenuous.

His Wife Blamed

On the following day more of the truth emerged from umbrage. Mrs. Martin related that when the trouble began the distinguished clergyman called on her and begged her not to tell her husband. By this time the whitewash committee was in action, and there was much talk of malicious gossip all of which was traced to the wife of the pastor. And as it turns out the only person who is to suffer in consequence of what the trustees have described as a "whitewash friendship" is a woman, and that woman is the wife of the much belauded clergyman who has been showered with encomiums by the Bough Bulletin and a Board of Public Works. There is much pity for Dr. Brown; the ladies of the congregation wept at the parting with their pas-

Sunday, but there is no record of a sigh for his wife who read a letter that disturbed her peace of mind.

Mystical Effusions

I have said that the trustees exonerated Dr. Brown, but of this there may be some doubt. In their report they nowhere formally exonerate the doctor. True they assert that the only relation existing between Dr. Brown and Mrs. Martin was that of "warm friendship," and this is quite true in so far as it goes, but it is not likely to put an end to gossip. There are people who feel that the letters are the evidence as to whether Mrs. Brown had no reason to lose confidence in her husband. These letters Mrs. Martin has refused to divulge, and Dr. Brown admitted in an interview that parts of the letters might, if separated from the context, receive an ugly construction. The reporter who interviewed him, evidently for the purpose of laying a basis for a request for permission to publish the letters, asked if the public would be likely to place a proper interpretation on the letters. Quickly it occurred to Dr. Brown that even a whole letter as well as certain parts, might be misunderstood. He said: "I don't think the public would. They would probably distort the real meaning I intended. The letters of course were different from letters which would be written to the public." To be sure they were. They were the expressions of "a warm friendship," and they contained some spiritual poetry. Now the Song of Songs is a spiritual poem, but it is not safe to say for the public. It is mystical. And it is one thing to infer that Dr. Brown too, is mystical, and that it has been customary for him to write mystical letters. For he admits having written several members of his flock letters similar to those written to Mrs. Martin. How strange that while members of his flock understand mysticism his wife does not! Mrs. Brown's position has been neglected.

The Curtain

In the final scene on which the curtain has dropped is that in which Mrs. Brown appears in the role of a jealous wife confessing that she has been a cruel injustice to a lady for whom her husband had a very warm friendship, and to whom he wrote letters which could not be accurately interpreted by the general. And as the curtain falls Dr. Brown, a gentleman and a scholar, appears to be thoroughly satisfied with himself. Yet above his halo somewhat dimming by fulgence, so luminous are the letters of flame, is the mystical word "coward," for which there is no explanation. It flashed into the play and the interest was high, and it remained even unto the happy ending. Apparently charged with significance the symbolism of it is food for profound intellectual study. To the mystics all things are mystical. But as to the general the mystical fillips curiosity, and hence the trustees have not accomplished their purpose. Even they, notwithstanding their amiable preconceptions, have not been permitted to see the letters or read the spiritual poetry.

The Genius of Casey

There is a vagrant rumor afloat to the effect that the Hon. Michael Casey, dictator of the Board of Public Works and Prince Royal of the current dispensation, is to become a member of the Board of Harbor Commissioners. Mr. Casey, so the story goes, made a great hit during the late campaign with Governor-elect Johnson who is very eager for him to take charge of State politics on the water front. Persons well versed in the mysteries of local politics do not give credence to this rumor. They are of the opinion that Michael Casey is so well satisfied with the present situation of his political affairs that he has no taste for the State job. Mr. Casey, it should be explained, is the boss of the municipal machine. Mayor McCarthy defers to his judgment in most everything. He was responsible for the recent withdrawal of Commissioner Broderick from the Board of Public Work. A question of patronage caused friction between Broderick and Casey, and the former returned to private life. Then Fire Commissioner Laumeister was appointed to fill the vacancy at Casey's request. It was Casey that put an end to the maneuvering that threatened Golden Gate Park with a change of management. And now it is rumored that Chief Murphy of the Fire Department, one of the most efficient and conscientious of officials, is about to be disciplined for not doing politics according to the wishes of Police Commissioner Sullivan, who is Mr. Casey's right hand man. So it is evident that Mr. Casey is a man of great power. And at the same time it appears that Mayor McCarthy is singularly quiescent, a circumstance that may in a measure have given color to the unpleasant stories which his Honor recently brought to the attention of the Grand Jury. For Mr. Casey in his wonderful zeal for harmony follows the Pauline practice of being all things to all men. He is on very friendly terms with the tireless strategists of the Bulletin-Phelan outfit, and it is suspected that he heeds their suggestions without paying deference to what concerns the interests of Mayor McCarthy. The mere appearance of such a state of things is of course enough to promote ugly rumors; for of course the question naturally arises, Why does McCarthy give Casey so much rope? The answer is, of course, that Mr. Casey knows what's what and who's who and is therefore a public servant of priceless worth. Mr. Casey, it should be remembered, is a man of great experience.

A Mot by De Wolf Hopper

In accordance with a time-honored custom the Press Club entertained Miss Lillian Russell last Thursday night. Having rendered the club an inestimable service many years ago Miss Russell was elected an honorary member and every time she returns to this city, is made the guest of the members at a rather pretentious jinks. Last Thursday night De Wolf Hopper was also the guest of the newspapermen. As the club has moved into new quarters since Miss Russell's last visit, she was presented with a golden key to the door and returned thanks in a very happy little speech. Immediately afterwards President Naughton proposed her health, the members sang "For she's a jolly good fellow" and De Wolf Hopper was called upon to respond. "Really," he began, "if Miss Russell loses that golden key, she will have no difficulty in replacing it. There seem to be a lot of keys in the Press Club. Just now when we all sang, there were as many keys as there were singers."

Are the Dramatic Critics Color-blind?

I am impelled to ask this question by the variety of colors which the dramatic critics found in the gown worn by Ellen Terry last week. There was a surprising divergence of opinion as to the hue of that gown. From the Examiner I learned that it was "built of soft supple silk, of a tint exactly matching the putty-gray tint of her ashen-blond hair." In the Chronicle I read that it was "of some soft green material." In the Call I found Ellen Terry referred to as "a brown-garbed woman." The Bulletin critic said that her gown was "moulded as in the sculptor's wet

Ellen Terry's Decline

Considering that Ellen Terry is about sixty-seven years of age it is not surprising that she should enjoy extremely poor health. When a woman has been on the stage for fifty years it may be taken for granted that her vital force is pretty nearly expended. Miss Terry is pitifully weak. After the performance last Thursday her eyes went back on her and she had to summon a specialist who treated her for two hours before she was herself again. In New York her condition was even more pathetic, as I learn from an article written by Franklin Fyles, the dramatic critic. Describing her lecture he said: "She stood at a high table on which lay an open book of such passages of Shakespeare as she was to half read and half recite, with interspersing accounts of the plots and characters. The print was by hand in large letters; for her memory and eyesight are both poor, and she won't wear glasses. The other day, when she couldn't command a line from either book or recollection, she burst into hysterical weeping and sympathetic women sobbed with her. The charm of the Terry personality was still appreciable, but plainly and pitifully the great artist was nervously weak if not seriously ailing." Sarah Bernhardt has announced that she expects to die of heart disease before an audience during her American tour, and the divine Sarah is only two years older than Ellen Terry. There is no doubt that they are both overtaking their waning powers.

Aviator Radley at Del Monte

James Radley, holder of the world's aviation record for speed, and the Scottish record for height, has decided to bring his Bleriot monoplane to Del Monte, preliminary to the great flights to be held in San Francisco during January. Radley is planning to do some new stunts at that time and has been hunting a place in California in which to experiment and accustom himself and his machine to atmospheric conditions along the coast. He has arranged with the management of Hotel Del Monte for the use of the Del Monte race track and will immediately open up a training camp there. On Saturday and Sunday, December 10 and 11, he will give exhibition flights and will deliver a lecture on "Airships and Aerial Navigation" at the race track. At this time visitors will be given an opportunity to inspect the famous Bleriot machine. During the experimental flights Radley expects to familiarize himself with the aerial conditions which are practically the same at Del Monte as in San Francisco, and will then go after the records of the big San Francisco meet.

"A Nation's Crime"

Another message has come from the pen of Mrs. I. Lowenberg whose novel "The Irresistible Current" dealing with a religious and social problem of perennial interest created a mild sensation on its appearance about a year ago. The new message like the first comes in the form of a novel. It is entitled "A Nation's Crime." Mrs. Lowenberg is a woman who gives a great deal of thought to social problems. The one that she has made the theme of her latest work is the divorce evil as complicated by the irreconcilability of the divorce laws of the several States. To show what tragic results are possible in the existing chaotic state of affairs she tells a story rich in dramatic interest, the story of the terrible humiliation of two proud and haughty young representatives of the plutocracy of Maryland whose mother was a Reno widow. They inherited a vast estate from their paternal grandmother, but as a result of a will contest the marriage of their parents was pronounced invalid by the courts of Maryland. The awful blight on their lives came just as marriage bells were about to announce the minglement of happy hearts. Mrs. Lowenberg is blessed with imagination, but she has not yet perfected the faculty on which the story-teller chiefly depends. The art of construction she has not yet mastered, and the intricate technique of dialogue. Her characters are addicted to the bad habit of talking out of a dictionary. Nevertheless Mrs. Lowenberg has given us a book worth while from the standpoint of homiletics. She is a good preacher and judged according to the standard of criticism by which writers of fiction are nowadays encouraged her novel, as such, is deserving of commendation.

That Hissing Episode

A most distressing incident of the Terry lecture last week was the hissing of the Hon. Jan D. Phelan by some very rude persons in the very cultured and fashionable audience. I am sorry that the matter was given publicity by the Call. If it had not been brought to public notice I should not make it the subject of comment for the sooner such unpleasant episodes are forgotten the better. Now that it is generally known that Mr. Phelan was hissed when he made his appearance for the purpose of introducing Miss Terry it should be explained that not more than a score or so of persons in the large audience contributed to the painful uneasiness and discomfiture of the Sequoia Club's distinguished spokesman. It should be further explained that the infelicity of Mr. Phelan's remarks, awkwardness of his speech, was due entirely to the shock that he received from the unmanly persons who expressed their hostility to him. Phelan usually fits such an occasion like a glove.

He generally knows what to say and how to say it. But on this occasion he floundered. His embarrassment was manifest but excusable. He seemed to feel that as he had been hissed it was necessary to inform the audience that the club had made no mistake, that he was really the proper person to officiate on such an occasion, and so he told his audience how friendly he was with the late Sir Henry Irving and how Henry had received him in England. Barring the hissing the afternoon was a Sequoia Club triumph. The club is deserving of great praise for having given the people the opportunity to meet Miss Terry. It is to be hoped that the club will do more for us along the same line, but not without keeping in mind the hissing incident. Mr. Phelan despite his many noble qualities has the misfortune to get on the nerves of many sensitive people. Some years ago he was almost mobbed at a meeting of the Hibernians when he attempted to preside, and it will be remembered that on his account many citizens refused to contribute to the fund for the reception of the fleet. For the present Mr. Phelan has the misfortune to be very much misunderstood.

The Death of Major Braslan

Major Charles P. Braslan who died in San Jose last week after suffering for twelve days from pneumonia, was one of California's foremost citizens and leaves friends to mourn him in all parts of the State. In San Jose where he lived for years on the beautiful old Alameda he was known to all his townsmen and is mourned by everybody. No Californian was better known in Washington where he spent a great deal of his time. The company of which he was the head supplied the Agricultural Department with the seeds which they send broadcast over the country. Owing to his powerful eastern connections he was selected by Governor Gillett to do missionary work in behalf of the Panama-Pacific Exposition and accomplished wonders. Had he lived he would have gone east again to continue his exertions. Major Breslan leaves a widow, a son by his first marriage and a baby daughter by his second.

Bridge Party Refreshments

I met on the street a few days ago a lady who was making preparations for one of the largest bridge parties of the week which she gave at the Palace. She was in a great hurry and I took the liberty of inquiring why she was so busy. She replied that she was ordering refreshments for her guests and was then on her way to arrange for the whisky and cigarettes. "Whisky and cigarettes at a bridge party?" I queried with a well simulated air of incredulity. "Of course," she answered; "if I didn't have whisky and cigarettes my guests wouldn't come."

Where Are Our Society Sports?

I read the other day that Templeton Crocker had joined the Marin Golf and Country Club and I was filled with pessimistic speculations. What, I thought, is the use of a young man joining a country club when he does not excel in any form of sport? Have our country clubs become mere social organizations where the women gather for tea and chatter and the men for highballs and a little golf or an occasional game of tennis? So far as I know Mr. Crocker cannot shoot; and neither, for that matter, can a great many other members of the Marin or other neighboring country clubs. This brings up an interesting question, What are our young society men doing for amateur sport? The obvious answer is that they are scarcely doing anything. There was a time when the gilded youths of San Francisco took a pride in excelling in some form of manly endeavor, but the present generation seems to have adopted other ideals. Young men like Templeton Crocker, Clare Payne, Cyril Tobin and many others whom I could mention evince no desire to acquire the reputation of gentlemen sports. In an older and more settled community they would take to sport as a matter of course; but here nothing is demanded of them more strenuous than the graceful balancing of a tea cup or the exertion of strength demanded in handing a young woman from her limousine.

She Was Mystified by a Word

It happened at a prominent woman's club and the woman involved is a member of a well known family who is high in Roman Catholic circles and has been playing an active part in society during the past two seasons. Politics was the theme of conversation and a wordy battle was indulged in by those present. In the course of the debate the president of the club turned to the woman in question and remarked: "You are a very astute politician." Whereupon this woman drew herself up to her full height and with anger flashing in her eye, burst out: "Astute! Astute! And what, please, do you mean by astute?" Upon being assured that no offense was meant she quieted down, but on the way home, not feeling perfectly satisfied, she again inquired of a clubwoman, "What did Mrs. Blank mean by saying that I was an astute politician?"

Mrs. Hart's Exposition Party

While we have not yet secured the approval of the Congress for our exposition project, we have just been treated to a world's fair entertainment, the originator of this novel affair being Mrs. Horace H. Hart of Claremont who dispensed hospitality to one hundred and fifty clubwomen at the Fairmont on Monday. It was what the caterers call a "combination affair," for it started with a reception in the salon of the ball room, continued with an elaborate luncheon in the ball room proper and wound up with bridge in the red room. The feature of the function was the decorative scheme which was devised by Miss Charlotte Williams. The motif was first indicated at the large table on which was built a miniature Panama Canal, with locks, walls, battleships, palm trees, mountains, Culebra Cuts and all the other things that we associate with the "Big Ditch." On the other tables were displayed the colors and flowers of all the nations that we hope will gather in San Francisco to celebrate the opening of the canal and incidentally, help to make our fair a success. On a long table at the end of the room were seen the towers and minarets of the "Dream City" that is to be, if all goes well, in 1915. The whole thing was worked out with considerable imagination and a few of the ladies could not resist whispering to one another that it cost one thousand dollars which is an impressive sum in these days of low exchequers and the high cost of living.

A Clash in Clubdom

If one had attended Mrs. Hart's luncheon endowed with the power of mind-reading, it would have been apparent that all was not calm serenity and peaceful enjoyment in the breasts of the clubwomen who accepted her hospitality. In fact, there was a good deal of feeling over the affair which only the most perfect self-control held in check. The grievance consisted in the fact that Mrs. Hart had chosen for her big party the day of the meeting of the directors of the California Club. Now it is quite apparent that the directors of a club cannot hold a meeting and also attend a reception, luncheon and bridge party in the space of a few short hours. When Mrs. Lovell White called the meeting to order she found that she had not a quorum present. The first vice-president and the second vice-president were among those who responded to the superior lure of Mrs. Hart's luncheon. There was nothing to do but adjourn the meeting and Mrs. Lovell White did it in her graceful manner and joined the rest of the big party at the Fairmont. Naturally the clash of dates has been adversely commented on; naturally, because it is natural for clubwomen to find matter for endless confabs in just such a trifle as this.

Some Were Not Invited

The good women of the California Club have also found food for conversation in the fact that not all the members of the club were invited to Mrs. Hart's affair. Personally I do not see the relevancy of this as a reflection on Mrs. Hart. The California Club is a large club and it is quite a big contract to undertake to entertain all its members at an affair not limited to one club. But it is being said that Mrs. Hart enlisted the assistance of another California club woman in making out the list and that this woman carelessly omitted the names of some members to whom she does not feel over friendly. It may have happened and then again it may have been an oversight that certain brainy members were ignored. I am prepared to give those critics the benefit of the doubt. After all, what is a woman's club if not a fountain-head of rather silly gossip? Mrs. Hart, by the way, is a very clever woman. She used to be a school teacher in Alaska and it was in that land of romance and gold that she met the wealthy mining man who became her husband. She is noted for her goodness of heart toward struggling artists and no offer of any worth ever appeals to her in vain. The Harts have no children of their own but Mr.

Herbert Law Off to Egypt

Mr. Herbert Law is again a resident of San Francisco, but he is not to remain with us very long. He is to leave in a few days for a pleasure trip to Egypt. Mr. Law recently sold out his holdings in the Western Steel Company of Seattle and I am told that the deal was one of the biggest of his career. The Western Steel Company was a small concern when he took charge about two years ago, but under his management it soon became an important factor in the steel industry; so much so that it attracted the attention of the trust by which it was absorbed. The report that Mr. Law is going away for an indefinite period has shattered the hopes of the intimate friends of the Law families who had been looking forward to the possibility of a reconciliation ever since the Herbert Laws were divorced. When the news of their estrangement became public about two years ago it was the cause of genuine grief to their friends, who found it hard to believe that what they had regarded as an ideal union could be permanently ruptured. All even when the divorce occurred it was not accepted as final by those friends of the family who felt that neither had any serious grievance against the other. But Mrs. Law has remained steadfast in her resolution, and she will probably never return to San Francisco. Mrs. Law has many friends in this city. She is a woman who inspires the warmest kind of friendship, for she has many graces of person, mind and heart. When the Laws were married they were in very modest circumstances. Their quick accession to wealth made no change in Mrs. Law, and the friends of her youth are her friends now and they love her for her sweetness and generosity of character. She will be greatly missed, for her charities were numerous. She was one of the most active of the directors of the Nursery for Homeless Children.

cisco but every woman in the St. Francis dining room wore a winter hat, except Mrs. Roosevelt who looked far more properly arrayed for the weather than those whose heads were covered with fur and velvet. The Roosevelts, by the way, have delighted their friends with their music. They both play the piano extremely well and Teddy Jr. can do as well as some professionals on the violin. Last week they entertained informally for Margaret Roosevelt who was one of the most popular visitors San Francisco has rushed in a long time. She has a simple cordial manner that won many friends. Her father was a cousin of Theodore the Great.

The Ball for Miss Chase

The number of private balls scheduled for the season has filled the vacant dancing dates left by the Colonials and Patronesses of last year. Beginning with the Crocker ball there will be more large private affairs this year than ever before. The second took place Thursday night when Miss Ysabel Chase made her formal bow at the Fairmont where Mrs. Will Tevis was hostess at a dance in her honor. Mrs. Tevis never does anything by halves and the affair was perfectly arranged in every detail. Miss Chase wore one of the debutante frocks brought to her from Paris by Mrs. William Miller Graham. Her mother assisted the hostess in receiving. Mrs. Tevis and Mrs. Chase were school friends as Minnie Mizner and Mabel Pacheco, and the latter made long visits at the Mizner home in Benicia.

The Other Private Dances

Friday Marguerite Doe made her bow at a reception followed by a dinner dance in the manner of Miss Agnes Tillman last year. This elaborate affair took place at the Fairmont also. On the fourteenth the Josselyn ball takes place and on the seventeenth Miss Ernestine McNear will be presented at a large dance at the Claremont Country Club which will be attended by more San Franciscans than Oaklanders. Miss Gertrude Thomas will make her debut at a ball on December 20 which brings the series up to the Greenway Christmas ball on December 23. With the Gayetys and Cinderellas there would be no room for Mrs. Alexander's Colonials or the Patronesses' ball this year.

The Josselyn Ball

There was a rumor that the Josselyn ball would take place at the new Bohemian Club but I believe the Maple Room of the Palace has been selected as the scene of Miss Myra's debut. It will be a brilliant affair at which the Josselyn family will make a large receiving party. They include the H. McDonald Spencers, the Gerald Rathbones and Miss Margery Josselyn and Mr. and Mrs. Ettore Avenali who will come from San Jose for the event. The Avenalis, by the way, are living quietly in a small cottage in the Garden City where the bride has proved herself a capable housekeeper. Her home is in modest contrast to that of her sister Mrs. Spencer at Menlo Park, and the Gerald Rathbone residence in Hillsborough.

Ladies' Day in Bohemia

Almost every woman I have run across since last Saturday commences her conversation by exclaiming, "Were you at the Bohemian Club on Saturday last? and what ideal hosts the Bohemian Club men are!" Everybody and his wife were present. It was such a crush that on all sides you heard the inquiry, "Have you seen my husband?" or "I'm looking for my wife"; or, "I've been looking for my daughter ever since I entered the club," etc. It was impossible to move comfortably and although the cards read from two to seven p. m., the guests were loath to leave. Indeed at seven the crowd of both men and women who stood ten deep before the "bar" was a sight to make the Owl blink. The jolly Bohemians gave their guests the privilege of signing their hosts' names to the wine cards. I miss my reckoning if there will not be some tall wailing and gnashing of teeth when the cards are checked up, especially after what I observed of some gay dames in the corner of a room. Raphael Weill's magnificent rooms were thronged with the fair sex the entire afternoon and the genial host dispensed freely the hospitality for which he is noted. One bachelor maid was seen rushing wildly upstairs saying, "I want to see the bachelors' nice rooms and sleeping apartments." A kind Bohemian offered his services and showed the rooms with pride. With a sigh she said, "How lonely!" Another gushing debutante sighed, "Oh! this is Heaven," to which a hardened married man rejoined, "Yes, but it's Hell to get here." He probably had vivid memories of his many excuses to his wife. Another girl remarked, "A club like this is a detriment to matrimony." Seldom have we seen such a display of gorgeous gowns, furs and millinery. But I must say right here that it showed extremely poor judgment and taste to appear as some of the ladies did, wearing evening gowns at an afternoon reception, especially at a man's club.

About Mrs. Vincent Whitney

Mrs. Vincent Whitney is looking extremely well this winter in a blue velvet suit and a hat trimmed with the same odd shade of blue plumes that exactly match her blue eyes. It is a very artistic combination which may have been advised by her quasi-brother-in-law Frank McComas who has an eye for color. Mrs. Whitney is intimate with Mrs. McComas and her sister Mrs. Parker Whitney Jr. who frequently visits her from Del Monte where she is spending the winter. There is a slight estrangement between young Mrs. Parker Whitney and her other relatives-in-law owing to the fact that she and her husband were separated this winter. But Mrs. Vincent has tact enough to avoid taking sides.

Her Correct Name is Danna

I see that all the daily papers have been in error in giving the name of the young woman to whom Leavitt Baker is engaged. Few readers would recognize from their curious misspellings that his pretty fiancée is Miss Ramona Danna, the interesting second daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Danna, now of Seattle but formerly well known residents of San Rafael. Miss Danna is a niece of ex-Sheriff Taylor of San Rafael. Her grandfather was a pioneer paper man. After the wedding Leavitt Baker and his bride will reside on the Baker ranch. Miss Danna will soon visit friends in this city and San Rafael where a great deal of entertaining will be done in her honor.

Since the Aviation Committee took up its headquarters in the Palace Hotel preliminary to the great meet which is to be held in this city in January the Palace has been the home of the noted birdmen who are assembling from all points of the earth. A Tribute to "The Kissing Girl"

By Edward F. O'Day

Having resisted the temptation to run away during the first ten minutes of "The Kissing Girl" and having steeled my powers of endurance for the ordeal of two out of the three acts, I may be pronounced, as an invincible optimist, for declaring the performance was not without profit. There is nothing so bad that good may not come of it, and while the good which I extracted from my attendance at the Savoy did not proceed from the play or from the players, it is connected with both and I place it at the disposal of the author and the actors, to be pleaded in extenuation of capital punishment, when they go before the judgment seat to get what is coming to them. It is surely something to witness a performance which balks the imagination and at the same time induces a high degree of contentment. This may sound paradoxical, but it is the simple statement of the mental process induced by "The Kissing Girl." Strain my imagination as I will, I cannot succeed in conjuring to the eye of my mind a worse musical comedy than "The Kissing Girl." The effort to conceive one has exhausted my powers and I have given it up. There follows naturally a sense of contentment. I have seen the worst there is to be seen on the musical comedy stage. No matter how long I may continue to attend musical comedy performances I find nothing inferior to "The Kissing Girl." It takes its place in my memory, unique, incomparable, utterly alone. Let me say of it with a feeling of real pleasure, "It is the worst I ever saw," and mark the night on which I witnessed this one which brought me an experience to be forever cherished. Life has a number of such instances and it is the unexpectedness of them that imparts a thrill to their remembrance. Going to the Savoy I little dreamed what was in store for me and it was well that it was so, for if I had known I would certainly have stayed away. But I went and endured the gaff for two acts and feel that I am entitled to whatever profit, to whatever pleasure I can extract from two hours of it were anything but profitable or pleasant in themselves. Realizing with considerable joy that I will long retain a vivid memory of "The Kissing Girl," it fills me with sorrow to think that I will not be equally tenacious of the names of the members of "The Kissing Girl" company. For the players are worthy of the play. Seldom have I seen the talents of a troupe so carefully fitted to the worth of their vehicle. If the authors of "The Kissing Girl" outdid themselves in its composition, the manager surpassed his worst previous record in the choice of a company. To see a venerable actor speaking bad lines is a spectacle full of pathos; to hear a passable singer trilling for music excites to tears; but to find that utterly impossible musical comedians have been trusted with an impossible musical comedy satisfies one's sense of justice. Why refer to the individual members of the company? Dire misfortune may have forced them on the stage in spite of their better judgment. Their home life may be beautiful. They may have any number of virtues not possessed by the average theatergoer. Then why charge against them that they are not musical comedians, that they never can be? Of one only will I speak, and of her only cause the posters accord her something in the nature of stellar attention. I refer of course to Miss Texas Guinan. She is heralded to the world as the niece of the estimable Senator Bailey of Texas and was doubtless christened for her beloved native State. Art in Texas has not been neglected. Some of our greatest connoisseurs of the lariat, some of our most exquisite dilettantes in cow punching, some of our most illustrious cultivators of rattlesnake whisky have been proud to call Texas their home. But hitherto the stage has not been much indebted to Texas. El Paso has given us no Patti, Houston no Bernhardt, San Antonio no Pavlowa. Dallas and Galveston are still to outdazzle the footlights by the brilliancy of their stars. I do not think that the Lone Star State would have us admit that this artistic remissness has been atoned for by Miss Texas Guinan. Simply because Miss Guinan bears the name of Texas we are not to conclude that she is the embodiment of Texas artistry. By any other name Miss Guinan would still be neither more nor less than she is now. She has a certain amount of facial beauty and a good punch. In her "big" scene she punches the leading man three or four times. To her credit be it said that she lands dexterously on his solar plexus but refrains from putting him out. In other scenes she administers other forms of personal chastisement, but the leading man is a perfect gentleman and does not retaliate. The combat is more equal when Miss Guinan tackles a feminine member of the cast. They pull hair and scratch faces. It is quite realistic, I should judge; but the audience does not enthuse. But then the audience did not enthuse at any stage of the proceedings.

"Madame X" at the Savoy

The last performances of "The Kissing Girl," with Beatriz Michelena-Middleton especially engaged for the role of "Christina," will take place at the Savoy Theater this Sunday afternoon, and evening and on Sunday night, "Madame X," the impressive story of mother-love which has created such a sensation in all the principal dramatic centers of the world, will begin a two week's engagement. The company which Henry W. Savage sends to interpret Alexandre Bisson's celebrated drama is said to be one of the strongest organized in recent seasons and includes Adeline Dunlap as the mysterious "Madame X," Howard Gould as Floriot and Robert Ober as Raymond Floriot. The comic opera comedian Jefferson De Angelis, will follow "Madame X" at the Savoy, commencing a week's engagement on Christmas in his latest success, "The Beauty Spot."

The De Gogorza Concerts

Emilio De Gogorza, the eminent Spanish baritone and one of the most artistic and interesting singers who visit us, will give his first concert this Sunday afternoon, December 11, at the Columbia, assisted by Robert Schmitz, pianist. The program will include songs in Italian, German, French and English, both modern and classic and of course there will be some delightful Spanish gems for encores, for De Gogorza is identified with those charming works and no one else sings them as he does. The second and last De Gogorza concert will be given the following Sunday afternoon with a complete change of program.

"Polly of the Circus"

Frederic Thompson's production, "Polly of the Circus," with Miss Ida St. Leon in the title role will be given once more in this city at the Columbia for two weeks beginning Monday, December 12. From first curtain to last the interest of this pleasant play is well sustained, while the six scenes required for the development of the plot give opportunity for an elaborate scenic production which is identical with that used at the Liberty Theater in New York City, where "Polly of the Circus" created a new record for attendance during a run of one entire season. Matinees Wednesdays and Saturdays. Special prices at Wednesday matinee.

The Tetrizzini Concerts

W. H. Leahy came out of his controversy with Oscar Hammerstein victorious and the great diva Tetrizzini will sing for us this coming Monday night, December 12, Saturday afternoon, December 17, and Tuesday night, December 20, a Dreamland which will be specially decorated and heated for these important events. At the opening concert, supported by a grand opera orchestra under Steindorff's direction, the artist will sing the "Caro Nome" from "Rigoletto," "Una Voce Poca Fa" from "Barbiere di Siviglia" and the "Mad Scene" from "Lucia" (flute obbligato by Walter Oesterricher) and other important works. At the Saturday matinee the principal numbers will be the Aria, "Ah! fors' lui" from "La Traviata," "Bel Raggio" from "Semiramide" and the "Polacca" from "Mignon." Tuesday night's concert will offer "Aria" from Bellini's "I Puritani," Bendedict's variations on "Carneval di Venezia" and the seldom heard coloratura aria from Meyerbeer's "Star of the North." All these works and many encores will be sung with orchestral accompaniment, besides which there will be a number of ballads with piano accompaniment, M. Andre Benoist being the assisting artist. Other numbers will be announced in the daily papers as full particulars have not yet been received.

Fitch Comedy at Alcazar

Encouraged by the artistic and pecuniary success that attended its recent production of the

SCENE IN THE FIRST ACT OF "MADAME X" WHICH HENRY W. SAVAGE WILL OFFER AT THE SAVOY THEATER TOMORROW NIGHT

Fish comedy, "Girls," the Alcazar management has decided to revive "The Girl With the Green Eyes," an equally charming play by the same author. It is announced for next Monday evening and throughout the week. When it was first presented, about nine years ago, "The Girl With the Green Eyes" ran an entire season in New York and for two years was one of the most profitable dramatic attractions on tour. Since it held the stage of the old Alcazar three weeks, early in 1906, there has been unceasing demand for its revival, especially since the demise of the man who wrote it. There are twenty-two striking characters in "The Girl With the Green Eyes," and thirteen of them are of the gentler sex. Elizabeth Stewart and Thurston Hall will impersonate the principal characters, with the remainder of the regular company and several extra players appropriately cast.

Forming Bill at the Orpheum

Hymack, the chameleon comedian who on the occasion of his vaudeville debut three years ago at the Empire Theater, London, set the playing community of that city talking and a little later perplexed Paris and last season had New York guessing, will be the headline attraction at the Orpheum next week. His act is unique. He impersonates a man who is expecting the visit of a friend who is a wonderful hypnotist. The invited one does not put in an appearance but demonstrates his ability from a distance by placing Hymack in a hypnotic condition during which some wonderful lightning changing is accomplished. "Marvelous Griffith" will be another potent attraction. The visits of lightning calculators and mental arithmeticians are by no means infrequent but Griffith completely eclipses anybody in this line previously witnessed. The musical comedy star Hilda Thomas and the quaint comedian Lou Hall will present the successful comedietta "The Substitute." It affords Miss Thomas a chance to sing a couple of songs and to display some clever character acting. Ruby Norton and John E. Stanley have an act of song, comedy and "josh" and their notices are highly eulogistic. Miss Norton is a San Francisco girl who will be remembered as having played not unimportant parts in musical comedy at the Tivoli. Next week will be the last of Cook and Lorenz, Richard Nadrage, Scheda and also of Mabel Hite and Mike Donlin in their successful skit, "Double Play."

New Farce-Comedy at Ye Liberty

Next Monday evening Manager Harry W. Bishop will offer at his Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, the initial production of a new farce-comedy, "Happie of the Chorus," the joint work of Al. C. Joy and Lionel Dalton. Al. Joy's name is a familiar one to playgoers of both sides of the bay, while Lionel Dalton has also achieved considerable renown as a newspaperman and composer as well, and together they have turned out what Ye Liberty management believe to be an excellent farce-comedy. It is of the rip-roaring variety, a farce in which the fun is the result of cleverly thought-out situations which follow one another in rapid succession, and in which the interest is sustained until the final curtain. There are a dozen cleverly drawn characters running through its three acts, and the action is enlivened by a number of musical numbers written especially

After the usual run of seven nights, "Happie of the Chorus" will be followed by "The Lost Trail," the successful Western play, and then "The Dollar Mark" will receive its Oakland presentation

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—A further sharp break in stocks last week was said to have been caused by the continuous selling of the recent bullish interests in the market, these people having been unable to liquidate any of their holdings in the last few weeks. It has been said that the November rise was not combatted by the banking interests, but that they did not participate in it. On the low points of Friday and Saturday it has been reported that scale buying of the best kind has occurred and that eventually this buying will have its effect on values by making a material advance in prices. Sentiment is excessively bearish as a result of poor railway returns just now, but it must be remembered that we will probably see railroad freight advances occur by the middle of January, thereby changing the complexion of railroad affairs. We feel like buying stocks on any setbacks.

Wheat—The Government will make its first estimate of the acreage and condition of winter wheat seeded for the crop of 1911 next Wednesday noon, Chicago time. It will have an important bearing on the values of the wheat product of 1910 and probably will be a live influence for some time to come. Meanwhile speculative sentiment for the movement is more in favor of higher prices than it has been for some time. Potent reasons for this are the existence of a large concentrated holding of long wheat in which there is a considerable loss on paper, thus making it reasonably safe, at present levels, for the larger professional speculators to align themselves with the big holdings. There is an enormous available supply of wheat shown at visible supply points that report officially and fully as large relative stocks at virtually all other commercial milling points not included in the official visible statement. It will require an enormous rate of consumption, coupled with continual falling off of primary receipts, to make an appreciable impression on these supplies.

Corn—Values have responded in part to the stubborn tone that has been manifested by the producers. Except for the moderate quantities that were sold at higher prices and the surplus above crib capacity that had to be marketed there has been comparatively little of the new corn sold. The recent big decline in prices has apparently more than offset in effect the fine weather for curing and handling the new crop. Husking operations are now virtually ended and it is to be assumed that some little forwarding will be done even at the low prices current.

Cotton—The census report showing the amount of cotton ginned to December 1 was published at the opening, December 8, and since it has been claimed that the greatest percentage of the crop had been ginned this year to November 14, ginnings after November 14 should not be any larger than the ginnings after said date last year.

Otherwise the crop should be larger than recent small estimates of 11,000,000 bales or under. Therefore an allowance for 765,000 bales ginned for the period November 14 to December 1 which was the amount ginned during the corresponding period one year ago, would point to a total ginned to December 1 this year of about 9,529,000 bales which will compare with 8,877,000 bales to the same date last year. If the ginnings should prove larger than 9,529,000 bales to December 1, the theory of short crop estimators will have disappeared. However, be this as it may, the fact of the matter is that the trade is paying too much attention to the size of the crop and far too little to the period of general retrenchment that the United States is slowly but surely entering upon. The Journal of Commerce prints an interesting article under the head of "Financial Conditions" from which we quote the following: "The United States is entering upon a period of retrenchment. Preliminary symptoms have already been afforded and it is learned from responsible financial sources that the principal railroad systems and industrial organizations are about to enforce more or less drastic curtailment with a view to reducing expenses now in many instances out of all proportions to income. December and January, it is understood, will bring announcement after announcement that men have been thrown out of their employment by the multifarious concerns dependent for business mainly upon the transportation companies. The U. S. Steel corporation plant is idle to the extent of almost 50 per cent. If this industry can be accepted, as it usually is, as a criterion of general conditions, the falling off in trade throughout the country must be greater than realized." We have pointed out some of the features in former advices and have ventured the prediction that the consumption of cotton during the present season would not exceed 11,250,000 bales under any circumstance, if the price was maintained around 15 cents, and as yet we have seen nothing in the situation to cause us to change our views.

ve know that they will be at their lovemaking within a few hours. It always happens so in plays like this.

The third act of course is the "big" act. Margaret Chalmers visits her father, Starkweather, in his office and he very indiscreetly shows her the papers which had been recovered from Knox's room by Hubbard while she and Knox were billing and cooing. As soon as her father's back is turned she takes "the papers" and drops them behind a picture on the wall. He misses them and demands them from her. She says she hasn't them, which is true enough. So Starkweather summons nearly all the characters who have figured in the previous acts and the room is searched. Luckily for the "big" scene nobody thinks of looking behind the picture. These people apparently never played "Hunt the handkerchief" in their younger days. There is only one thing left to do. As the papers are not in any hiding place in the room, they must be on Margaret Chalmers' person. She must be searched. But she is given an alternative. If he gives them up, Hubbard won't tell what he knows about her. She stands firm, so Hubbard tells all about her naughty visit to Knox's room. Then the "big" scene continues.

Starkweather—Nothing else remains to be done. Dobleman, and you, Hubbard, take her behind the screen. Strip her. Recover the papers. (Dobleman is in a proper funk, but Hubbard betrays her, unwillingness.)

Chalmers—No; that I shall not permit. Hubbard shall have nothing to do with this.

Margaret—It is too late, Tom. You have stood by and allowed me to be stripped of everything else. A few clothes do not matter now. If I am to be stripped and searched by men, Mr. Hubbard will serve as well as any other man.

However, Starkweather finally consents to have the searching done by maids.

Margaret—(Wildly, backing away from Housekeeper.) I will not tamely submit. I will resist, I promise you.

Starkweather—Use force, if necessary. (The Maids are reluctant, but Housekeeper commands them with her eyes to close in on Margaret, and they obey.) (Margaret backs away until she brings up against desk.)

Housekeeper—Come, Mrs. Chalmers. (Margaret stands by trembling, but refuses to notice Housekeeper.) (Housekeeper places hand on Margaret's arm.)

Margaret—(Violently flinging the hand off, crying imperiously.) Stand back! (Housekeeper instinctively shrinks back, as do Maids. But it is only for the moment. They close in upon Margaret to seize her.) (Crying frantically for help.) Linda! Linda! (Linda springs forward to help her mistress, but is caught and held struggling by Chalmers, who twists her arm and finally compels her to become quiet.) (Margaret, struggling and resisting, is hustled across stage and behind screen, the Maids warming up to their work. One of them emerges from behind screen for the purpose of getting a chair, upon which Margaret is evidently forced to sit. The screen is of such height, that occasionally, when standing up and struggling, Margaret's bare arms are visible above the top of it. Muttered exclamations are heard, and the voice of Housekeeper trying to persuade Margaret to submit.)

Margaret—(Abruptly, piteously.) No! No! (The struggle becomes more violent, and the screen is overturned disclosing Margaret seated on chair, partly undressed, and clutching an envelope in her hand which they are trying to force her to relinquish.)

Mrs. Starkweather—(Crying wildly.) Anthony! They are taking her clothes off! (Renewed struggle of Linda with Chalmers at the right.) (Starkweather, calling Rutland to his assistance, stands screen up again, then, as an afterthought, pulls screen a little further away from Margaret.)

Margaret—No! No! (Housekeeper appears triumphantly with envelope in her hand and hands it to Hubbard.)

Hubbard—(Immediately.) That's not it. (Glances at address and starts.) It's addressed to Knox.

Starkweather—Tear it open. Read it. (Hubbard tears envelope open.) (While this is going on, struggle behind screen is suspended.)

Hubbard—(Withdrawing contents of envelope.) It is only a photograph—of Mrs. Chalmers. (Reading.) "For the future—Margaret."

Chalmers—(Thrusting Linda back to right front and striding up to Hubbard.) Give it to me. (Hubbard passes it to him, and he looks at it, crumples it in his hand, and grinds it under foot.)

Starkweather—That is not what we wanted, Mrs. Middleton. Go on with the search. (The search goes on behind the screen without any further struggling.) (A pause, during which screen is occasionally agitated by the searchers removing Margaret's garment.)

Housekeeper—(Appearing around corner of screen.) I find nothing else, sir.

Starkweather—Is she stripped?

Housekeeper—Yes, sir.

Starkweather—Every stitch?

Housekeeper—(Disappearing behind screen instead of answering for a pause, during which it is patent that the ultimate stitch is being removed, then reappearing.) Yes, sir.

Starkweather—Nothing?

Housekeeper—Nothing.

Starkweather—Throw out her clothes—everything. (A confused mass of feminine apparel is tossed out, falling near Dobleman's feet, who, in consequence, is hugely mortified and embarrassed.) (Chalmers examines garments, then steps behind screen a moment, and reappears.)

Chalmers—Nothing. (Chalmers, Starkweather, and Hubbard gaze at each other dumbfoundedly.) (The two Maids come out from behind screen and stand near door to right rear.) Starkweather is loath to believe, and steps to Margaret's garments and overhauls them.)

Starkweather—(To Chalmers, looking inquiringly toward screen.) Are you sure?

Chalmers—Yes; I made certain. She hasn't them.

In the concluding act Margaret returns the papers to Knox who calls at her home. Knox forgets all about his speech and his millennial reforms. He has a bad case of love for another man's wife and can talk and think of nothing else. There is a torrid scene which Margaret's husband watches. Then ensues a curious scene between the husband and the lover in which they try to arrange some sort of a future for Margaret, but in the end Margaret insists that the greatest thing of all is for Knox to make his speech and "save the people." Knox is not as keen about the people as he is about Margaret, but he reluctantly consents and leaves the house with the cheering reflection that Margaret's husband has a bad heart and can't last very long.

I have not referred to the socialistic patter with which the play is crammed, nor to the long speeches about the uplift of the masses and the criminality of the rich, because they are not interesting or even original. The muckrakers have said the same things without trying to make them dramatic, as Jack does. Aside from the frenzied hunting for "the papers" and the undressing scene, the play lacks action. It is an unsuccessful attempt to dramatize the newspapers and the magazines.

tered the door, she would welcome him with open arms and secretly plead forgiveness for all the silly stuff that had entered her head. She would never torment herself or him again with such nonsense.

The next day came. But at her morning chocolate Frieda caught herself brooding over the account of the Chicago lady, Mrs. Weightman, and the experience of her friend Sidonia, and at the same time Kurt came into her thoughts.

She was very indignant at herself.

But that did not help along. In the course of the day she felt herself forced again and again into that same circle of thought. "It is simply maddening!" she cried out.

Then it occurred to her that her crochet-work might soothe her nerves and give some other direction to her thoughts. It was a delightful bit of point intended as a table ornament and to be included in her wedding outfit. She took up the hand-bag in which it lay undisturbed since her visit to Sidonia. She hastily drew out the unfinished work. At the same moment three crumpled papers came to view. How had they got in there? Ah, yes, she remembered! They had been thrust upon her on the street the day before.

She smoothed out one sheet, and started up in great agitation. The longer she looked at it, the faster her breath came and went. A hundred plans flashed through her brain in the same instant. Finally she seemed to have struggled through to a resolution. She carefully smoothed out the two remaining sheets of paper, dropped the lace-work from her mind, and slipped away into her own room, where she occupied herself for some time.

When she came out a great change had come over her. She danced about in high spirits, hugged her aunt in the drawing-room, and gave her such a violent kiss that the old lady's breath almost forsook her.

"Such a girl!" the latter scolded. "First she sulks around all day, and now she doesn't know what to do with herself for very coltishness. But the girls of today are that way—like April weather!"

Frieda clapped her hands. "Auntie," she begged, "when Kurt comes, leave me alone with him for a moment, please. I have some business to transact with him alone, something very important."

The old lady knitted her brows. "So—o!" was her only answer.

Nevertheless, when Kurt arrived at seven o'clock sharp, as usual, and she had greeted him in the hall, she withdrew to her kitchen.

Frieda awaited him in the parlor. She did not throw herself about his neck, as she had promised herself the evening before, but she danced gaily up to him and offered her lips for a kiss.

"Well, better humor tonight, darling?" he asked with agreeable anticipations.

"Oh, yes! But—Kurt, I must transact some earnest business with you first."

He laughed. "Something earnest? You? No! I'm splitting with curiosity. Really earnest, Frieda?"

She became still more embarrassed. But she quickly regained her self-control. "Kurt, I must tell you an experience of my friend Sidonia's."

Stammering at first, then more fluently, she reported it. He listened, shaking his head slowly by way of accompaniment. "And now, Kurt, I wanted to ask you"—she began to stammer—"if you are so—so interested in my money? If—whether you wouldn't like me better without it?"

Thereupon he drew her to himself with a gesture of superiority. "You are a silly little goose.

Do you understand me? A perfect ninny you are. If I didn't know what silly whims you girls often get into your heads, I should be seriously angered by such questions. But I can't be really angry with you, because I love you too dearly."

"Then it is quite indifferent to you, whether I bring you anything but my trousseau, or not?"

"Now, darling, stop! But since you seem to have taken it into your head to demand a definite expression, in order to end the matter once for all, I will answer you as becomes an honorable man. Thus, then. It merely awakened a pleasant emotion when Aunt Friederica revealed to me the secret of your fortune. But with the love which I offer you, the contemptible money-question has nothing to do. Not in the least. There is even no outward occasion for it. For, thank heaven, I have my own perfectly safe income. Over and above that, I am tolerably 'well-heeled,' as the people are accustomed to say of those who are not entirely without means. Now, are you satisfied?"

"I thank you, Kurt."

She went to a stand and took a paste-board box in each hand, boxes that might once have contained toilet-soap. In the covers of the box sections had been made, just large enough for one to see what they contained, without the necessity of opening them.

Standing at some distance she held them out toward him, with the open covers forward. "What is in the boxes?" she asked.

"Good heavens! Hundred-mark notes!" cry escaped him.

"Quite right!" In the next instant the two boxes flew into the stove, in which a bright fire was crackling.

At first he was dumfounded. Then he made an effort to reach the stove.

But she prevented him with outstretched arm. "Is it so much to you, then?"

"Are you mad?" he asked almost fiercely.

Her face assumed a bitter expression. "Mad!" she shook her head. "I am perfectly calm and in my right mind." She seized a poker and stirred up the fire. "There, now! That is done!"

He folded his arms and stared at her amazed, devoid of all comprehension. Again he said: "You are crazed!"

"On the contrary. I am perfectly conscious of the whole range and meaning of my actions. What I need for my outfitting I have retained. The rest lies in ashes. Now, perhaps, you understand the earnest business which I wished to transact with you. I ask you once again: Do you love me still?"

He tried to laugh, but could not.

"Frieda—child! I can't comprehend it at all! I must reproach myself most severely for allowing myself to be surprised so, for not hindering you by force. It is a terrible sin which you have just committed. It borders—forgive me—indeed, borders on insanity. And then, too, these almost insulting questions! Is your love for me so slight, do you have so little faith in me, that there is need of such outrageous proofs? Shame on you—shame!"

Shyly she slipped near him and whispered: "Forgive me, Kurt!"

He did not move.

"I feel deeply ashamed. Please forgive me! You do not know how proud I am of you now."

Then he took her head between his hands and held her at arm's length. "A perfect little wrong-head!" he scolded. "Incredible what whims you girls have! Shall I forgive? Or shall I not?" He turned her head hither and thither. But when he saw that the tears were running down her cheeks, he could not restrain himself longer. He pressed his lips to hers. "You are, and will remain, my own dear silly little goose. But as my wife you will get no paper money into your hands. And in money matters generally I shall have to keep a sharp lookout for your fingers."

She clung blissfully in his embrace. Was it not happiness in its perfection to be loved by such a man?

But soon the rogue awoke her. She put her hand into her apron pocket and drew out a crumpled note.

"See, Kurt, what I have here!"

"What is it?"

"Just look!"

It was the third of the advertising sheets which had been given her on the street. The back was printed with an advertisement, but in front it looked like a fresh blue hundred-mark note. Kurt himself had received such papers on the street and thrown them away.

Then it began to dawn upon him. "What you threw into the stove—"

"Were, as you seem rightly to suppose, two worthless notes like this on top, the rest ordinary tissue paper. What do you say now to your silly little goose, whose fingers you will have to watch so carefully in money matters? Please, a somewhat more intelligent face, my lord!"

Both burst into unrestrained laughter. Aunt Friederica came into the room and inquired after the cause of it.

But neither revealed their secret.

Auto Notes

At the road races held at Santa Monica on Thanksgiving Day, five cars were equipped with Fisk Bolted-On Tires and Removable Rims. Each car finished the race without changing tires, winning first and third in the 101 mile race and third in the 302 mile race. Drivers in Southern California appreciate the element of safety in Fisk Bolted-On Tires, and are demanding this equipment on their cars before entering a race.

With the Oakland Show over several 1911 models which reached this city just in time to be rushed over to the Idora Pavilion, are now for the first time being inspected on the local automobile row. Among those which are attracting the largest attention are the New Hupmobile touring and torpedo-body cars.

The local branch of the Diamond Rubber Company reports that numerous replies are now being received from the eastern automobile manufacturers to the letter sent out by the Diamond branch relative to holding the Panama-Pacific Exposition in San Francisco. All, except three, have expressed themselves in favor of this city. Of these three two are indifferent and the third is for New Orleans.

Among the recent visitors at the Chalmers plant were J. A. Blackledge and A. L. Pelton. Nothing very striking about the names in themselves but when the two gentlemen rode out to the Chalmers factory in the same motor car they represented two extreme parts of North America. Mr. Blackledge calls Mexico City his home while Mr. Pelton is a resident of Kentville, Nova Scotia.

The Consolidated Motor Car Company reports that three carloads of 1911 Pope-Hartford cars are now en route here from the factory. This shipment includes foredoor touring cars, pony tonneaus and limousines. The interest created by the 1911 demonstrating car which arrived here recently is drawing much attention to the coming of the more complete Pope-Hartford lines.

Garry Herrmann of Cincinnati went to Detroit last July and was elected Grand Exalted Ruler of the Elks by acclamation. His Cincinnati lodge captured the rest of the glory at the big Elks' convention by winning the Hudson touring car offered to the lodge whose ladies made the handsomest appearance in the Elks' pageant. The judges were unanimous in awarding the Hudson to Garry Herrmann's delegation.

Among the interesting sales made at the Oakland Automobile Show was that of a Haynes five-passenger touring car to W. A. Corbus of Berkeley. Mr. Corbus came to the show with the express purpose of selecting an automobile and tried out practically all the cars exhibited before making the Haynes his final choice.

Probably more emphatically than its victories either in the Elgin or 250 mile Atlanta Race the Lozier's victory on the Santa Monica course last Thursday established it as the champion road rac-

A good motor car asks no favors of the weather. The day has passed when owners of automobiles pack their cars in moth balls with the first descent of Jack Frost.

With the arrival of the bracing cold and snowy days, ninety-two per cent of Chalmers owners put on windshields, tops, chains, caps, gloves, warm coats and robes, and—"go to it." It's great!

With top and side curtains, warm robes and a 'hot iron' any car is comfortable all winter long for all members of the family. People don't "wait till spring" any more to buy cars. An automobile is a twelve-month proposition and as serviceable in saving time in one season as another.

The Lozier's performance is easily the feature of this season's road racing events, not only because of its three victories scored in record breaking time on courses located in three different corners of the country but quite as much so because of its remarkable consistency in other events entered.

Tony Nichols, manager of the Weinstock Nichols Co's tire department, has just returned from Los Angeles where he assisted in the establishment of the Weinstock Nichols Los Angeles branch. According to his report this Los Angeles store is one of the most handsome auto accessory establishments on the Pacific Coast. The finishings are in mahogany and there are extensive windows of finest plate glass. The Morgan & Wright Los Angeles branch has been absorbed by the Weinstock Nichols concern and the Morgan & Wright tires are now distributed in Southern California from the main Weinstock Nichols store which is located in Olive street in the heart of the Los Angeles automobile trade.

A decided feature of the 1911 automobile output is the increased use of fore-door body types. The attractiveness and exquisite lines of this design has made it a decided favorite with lovers of automobile elegance throughout the country. Among the manufacturers who have developed it most highly in their 1911 output is the Haynes Automobile Company of Kokomo, Indiana. This concern is using the fore-door to some extent on all of their models, although the model 20 touring car is also built with the open front for those who have preference for this style.

Bailey Millard's New Book

Bailey Millard's "Sea Hawk" instantly calls to mind Frank Norris "Moran of the Lady Betty," and a good thing it is to be reminded of anything that Norris left us. "The Sea Hawk" is by no means an imitation of "Moran," but it has its beginning in San Francisco bay and its practical ending in the gulf of California, with a good part of the action taken up by encounters with Chinese junk pirates. The whole situation is a complicated one since it involves far-reaching plots and schemes and what seems simple enough in the inception grows more and more involved as the story works itself out. When Edwin Tevis, a practical electrician working in an Oakland shop while he toils over inventions of his own during his night hours, seeks relaxation in canoeing in Oakland creek he is far from dreaming that the beautiful daughter of the millionaire whose expensive steam yacht is temporarily lying up there is to become his companion in a wild voyage of which they two are almost the only ones to escape with their lives and the treasure which is to prove so costly. Scarcely has the yacht left the harbor, bound ostensibly across the Pacific, when an unexpected opportunity to loose from the shop offers itself to Tevis. Captain Thrale of the Tropic Bird, convoyed by his wife, who is evidently his captain, entered into negotiations for an electrical outfit to be used in pursuing some wrecking operations in the south seas, and for a competent man to oversee the work and Tevis offered himself for the position. Before they had been long at sea he began to be mystified by the evident unseaworthiness of the schooner, the large crew which she had shipped and the contradictory and unsatisfactory answers given to his inquiries concerning the electrical supplies, all of which were answered by the march of events when by some quick juggling of circumstances he found himself transferred to the Thetis, now to become the Searcher, and bound on a pirating expedition to the Gulf of California where the pearling concessions are held by Chinese companies. Mrs. Thrale, "the sea hawk," was the moving spirit of the adventure, a queer compound of puritanical straight-lacedness and avarice. She was intent on getting rich as rapidly as possible, after years of sober frugality, and had conceived the scheme of coming into possession, for a time, of the fine yacht and using it as a basis from which to rob the Chinese concessionaires, working the beds at night by means of powerful electric lights and diving dress at a greater depth and distance from shore than would be practical for the Chinese themselves. The scheme proved a great success but there was already a crew of pirate Chinese robbing the lawful owners and they and the crew of the yacht made reprisals on each other, Mrs. Thrale, "the sea hawk," as the men called her, being the most intolerant of their dishonesty. A gunboat sent out by the Mexican government in the interests of the concessionaires made a third in the warfare and it was in a desperate effort to evade her that Mrs. Thrale, disregarding everything save her intention to preserve the fortune which they had secured, locked herself in the wheelhouse and by sheer dominating masterfulness insisted on running through the strait in the height of a storm, to the final destruction of the vessel and nearly everyone on board. When the Thetis was abandoned just outside San Diego with the intention of letting the crew of the Tropic Bird take possession of her, it was in the plan that all hands should be safely rowed to shore, but the best of plans will miscarry and Hazel Braisted, together with her affianced husband, Sir Charles Walden, were picked up by one of the schooner's boats and brought back, to add force to the dangers and adventures. Hazel supplies a motive for "heart interest," without which so many readers—and publishers—appear to consider a story incomplete and Sir Charles, with his monumental selfishness and physical and moral cowardice, so unlike the typical Englishman who can be always counted on to rise to the occasion, furnishes a foil for Edwin Tevis, but the story would have been strengthened had Hazel Braisted been left ashore somewhere. She does not fit into the picture, as the dominating and masterful Mrs. Thrale does and nothing that she does has the remotest bearing on the train of events. She is simply one more to be taken care of under circumstances where there is the least time and no means of gallantry. A woman of her type is as much out of place in a story of wild adventure as she would be actually intruding herself on such scenes. Mr. Millard himself must know it for he had the courage to eliminate the ubiquitous female from his other novel, "The Lure o' Gold," and no one has missed her. Any one who enjoys a good sea story full of adventure and, storm winds and salt seas must enjoy "The Sea Hawk." The very name of Captain Thrale's schooner, bound for the south seas, too, the Tropic Bird, should prove a lure for local readers. Wessels and Bissel are its publishers.

He Matched It

After ten years he returned, footsore and weary. His wife met him at the door.

"I thought you were dead," she told him.

"You should have known better than that," he said. "Do you remember that last piece of net I tried to match for you? You scolded me because there was a difference of an eighth of an inch in the width of the folds, and I vowed that I would never again return from matching anything for you until I had found the exact thing you wanted."

He handed her a package.

"Here is that old rose binding braid that you told me to buy. I found it last Monday in Billings, Mont. I have looked for it in thirty-seven States."

She tore off the wrappings.

"It is a little too dark," she said.

"But the sample has faded some in ten years," he reminded her.

"It is a little too heavy, besides."

"But handling by thousands of clerks has worn the sample away some. It was heavier when I started out."

"I suppose I can make it do," she said.

The Senatorial Situation

Many of the politicians would have us believe that the Senatorial situation is much complicated and that owing to the susceptibility of the Direct Primary law to a variety of interpretations there is bound to be a deadlock in the next Legislature. A deadlock is what legislators of a certain brand delight in. There is nothing more conducive to the joys of statesmanship or to the means of expanding its ecstasies. So a deadlock is doubtless what we shall have at Sacramento this winter, and if we have it responsibility for it and for the temptations that it involves will be justly charged against the patriots of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League who affect the belief that under the law the Hon. John D. Works is entitled to the seat now occupied by the Hon. Frank Flint. By no plausible interpretation of the law, it is interesting to observe, can Mr. Works claim anything more than the privilege of causing a deadlock. Members of the Legislature can comply with the law either by voting for the choice of their respective districts expressed at the primary, or for the candidate who received the endorsement of his party in the greatest number of districts. Now whichever alternative is followed Mr. Works cannot win. For it happens that Mr. A. G. Spalding captured a majority of the districts. Mr. Works received a plurality of the popular vote, but the law says nothing about the popular vote. The letter of the law unquestionably supports the claim of Mr. Spalding. As to the spirit of the law we have the assurance of pretty good authority that it is in accordance with what Mr. Spalding's friends pronounce the letter of the law. Our authority is Speaker Stanton of the Assembly by whom it was introduced in that body. He says that the Direct Primary bill became a law with but one change in the original draft, and by that change the vote by districts was substituted for a state-wide vote. In other words the Legislature deliberately rejected the principle of election under which the Hon. John D. Works now lays claim to the toga.

The Ballinger Conspiracy

The majority report of the committee appointed by Congress to investigate the official conduct of Secretary Ballinger was anticipated not only by the gentleman's friends but also by his enemies. And now as was expected his enemies are telling us that the report is of no consequence inasmuch as it is contrary to the popular verdict. These venomous muckrakers gleefully assume that they have indelibly blackened the Secretary's character, and apparently they are proud of their achievement. Indeed it would probably pain them very much if they were to learn that their long and bitter campaign of calumny had been in vain. But how do they really know that they have achieved a triumph in the art of slander? They have no means of registering public opinion on the question of Mr. Ballinger's guilt or innocence. The public is a strange, capricious and incomprehensible beast. Often dull and easily hoodwinked, it is frequently wiser than the wisest critic. The public has a fine taste for calumny but a great scorn for the calumniator. Now how do we know that it has not dawned on the perceptions of the people that Mr. Ballinger has been very much misrepresented? We know that he has the confidence of the President, we know that one of the most distinguished of American statesmen, Mr. Elihu Root, who was recently appointed to the Hague Tribunal, has pronounced him innocent of wrongdoing. Are we to suppose that for the judgment of such men the people have no respect? Perhaps the muckrakers are under a delusion respecting the degree of credence that is given to their furious appeals to public prejudice. Of late certain phenomena have given the impression that the artisans of the great American defamation bureau have worn their favorite themes somewhat threadbare. We surmise that to hold public interest they must gather fresh inspiration, seek new fields of endeavor, new characters to besmirch, new tongues of malice to supply them with detraction. There have been signs of readjustment of popular sympathies and antipathies. Consider in this connection that the conspiracy against Secretary Ballinger was under the same management as the artfully handled uproar against Speaker Cannon. The uproar petered out to empty benches, and the Ballinger conspiracy betrayed signs of inanition long before the Secretary's official exoneration. And while we were witnessing the gradual extinction of interest in the two most elaborate masterpieces of insurgent genius we became conscious of the fading from view of those talented experts in intrigue, the Hon. Gifford Pinchot and the Hon. James R. Garfield. Gradually the people arrived at an understanding of the animus of the passionate zeal of those two sorehead survivors of the Roosevelt era, and then it was no longer difficult to apprehend the truth respecting their performances. All the charges against Secretary Ballinger were fashioned in the Pinchot-Garfield political workshop, and distributed to the trade by Norman Hapgood, the Fremont Older of Collier's Weekly. The only testimony of their worth was such as was procured by Pinchot and Garfield, and as it now appears this testimony was as impure as the source of the supply.

The Prophet of Insurgency

The men that tried to bring scandal on the Taft Administration by means of the conspiracy against Secretary Ballinger are now vigorously pressagenting the cause of "Battle Bob" La Follette in the hope of maneuvering him into the Presidential nomination in 1912. They have abandoned the frazzled Roosevelt to his fate. They have lost faith in T. R. They believe that he has played himself off the boards, and they are not all displeased at the loss of his grip on the public imagination. For the colonel, they have perceived, is not to be adjusted to any procrustean bed of politics. He was for Teddy first and for the cause afterward. His principles of strategy forbid an irrevocable alliance with any particular side. While the leaders of insurgency want is the whole works; no division of the pie-wagon freight for them. And "Battle Bob" has been anointed for leadership. They believe that with the little man from Wisconsin they can conjure some. For La Follette is ultra-radical. He is a statesman of the up-to-date Chautauqua school. For a citizen of San Francisco to understand just what sort of a man La Follette is he has but to conceive of the blending of all the qualities of heart and mind of Francis J. Heney and E. P. Troy. This is the combination that appeals to the patriots who are intent upon the redemption of the country. La Follette is their ideal redeemer. They are convinced that as President he would excel Mr. Roosevelt as a disturber of business. And doubtless they have made a very accurate estimate of his ability. "Battle Bob" is of that type of statesman that is always prepared to provoke a storm if it may give him opportunity to reap a rainbow.

Justice According to Bob

President Taft has once again dissipated the misgivings of the conservative element of our citizenry. By his appointment to the Supreme Court he has given us renewed assurance that he is not to be carried off his feet by the dithyrambic clamors of vociferous Jacobins. What they expect we may infer from some recent utterances of "Battle Bob" La Follette. He said among other things that he was of the opinion that only such men should be appointed as are in harmony with the spirit of the times and disposed to view public questions from the progressive standpoint. In other words "Battle Bob" is much opposed as Mr. Roosevelt to a fossilized judiciary. He would have our judges quickly responsive to the will of the people and guided rather by expedient than principle. Judges of this type would enable us to get quick action on new schemes of government. They would be disposed to regard the Constitution as an obsolete instrument, as the voice of a people of the dead past, not to be permitted to frustrate the will of the present generation as interpreted by a Congress composed of La Follettes. "Battle Bob" seems to have great confidence in the legislative branch of the government. Apparently he thinks it can do no wrong; for according to his philosophy when there is conflict between a measure passed by Congress and the Constitution which is supposed to be the voice of the people, the Supreme Court should assure that the people have altered their views. Also according to "Battle Bob's" philosophy the people should be given their head at all times, and the Constitution should cease to be regarded as a bulwark of the people against their own uninstructed will. And strange as it may appear by no means singular is "Battle Bob's" conception of what a Supreme Court should be. The species of Philistinism of which the philosophy of the distinguished statesman from Wisconsin is a shining example is rampant in this broad land today. The Chautauqua Philistines have widely distributed their lies, and there are many people running wild. The Philistine is a person who believes that everything he stands for is unconditionally perfect. He is always ridiculous because of his serious way of treating the passing moment. He thinks it has all the importance which it seems to have. When he demands that the Supreme Court shall decide cases in accordance with the spirit of the times he is unconscious of the fact that he is merely alluding to the spirit of his own platoon of people. He believes in his spirit to be something new, but it is as old as the hills. In every age there are men who believe themselves to be the heralds of the future, and they are merely the rainbow chasers of all days and generations. "Battle Bob," a typical Philistine, fancies himself a reformer; yet his conception of what a Supreme Court should be is in conflict with the first principle of reform. True reform has its high origin in ideal justice. "Battle Bob" would have justice dispensed on the principle that popular sovereignty is arbitrary power. He would have the judges always conjecture the will of the people before deciding a case; in other words he would have them follow the example of the judges of monarchical despotism—decide according to the will of the arbitrary power. This is not ideal justice. It is distinctly mob rule.

The Fair Compromise

The California fair boosters in Washington, we were told last week, were negotiating a compromise with the boosters from New Orleans by the terms of which, it was hoped, all opposition to San Francisco would be withdrawn and the West would give its support to the Lakes to the Gulf deep waterway scheme. This is an enterprise which will receive a great deal of attention in the next Congress. It calls for the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars by the general Government for the purpose of supplying the Mississippi with a largely increased volume of water from the Great Lakes through the Chicago drainage canal, the Desplaines and the Illinois rivers. It is said that the purpose of the leading promoters of the enterprise is to build locks and other contrivances in the Illinois River with the aid of which they will be able to operate a water power plant capable of producing a revenue of $3,000,000 a year. This gigantic project is destined to have vigorous opposition. President Taft views it with suspicion, and he has suggested that it be submitted for investigation to army engineers, but the promoters resent his attitude and demand that the reports of their own engineers be accepted. Of course the whole Mississippi Valley is deeply interested in the project, as it is proposed to give the upper Mississippi a depth of fourteen feet, and this is believed to be all that is necessary to insure the revival of the river traffic. The carrying out of this project is certainly of vastly greater importance to the people of the Mississippi Valley than the holding of a fair in New Orleans. And the people who expect to reap the benefits are well aware that they have a very big fight on their hands.

A Coachman's Tribute

In many languages have the praises of Leo Tolstoi been sung. Since the death of the great Russian literary artist and reformer writers of all nations have vied with one another in giving testimony to the splendor of his genius and the grandeur of his character. Appreciations of Tolstoi have exhausted the language of encomium. There is nothing more to be said as to his idealism or his altruism, his art or his religion. But the highest tribute that has been paid to the memory of the noble Russian is one that has attracted the least attention. We refer to the suicide of Tolstoi's coachman. In the despatches the other day we were told that this humble individual, whose name was regarded as of so little importance that it was not mentioned, overcome by grief at the loss of his master went to Tolstoi's grave, opened a vein in his arm with a kitchen knife and bled to death. Here we have a bit of tragic drama more eloquent, more persuasive, than all the innumerable eulogies of Tolstoi that have been inspired by critical appreciation of his performances. The tribute of affection thus paid at his grave is one of touching sincerity. It is the tribute of an humble but impassioned soul whose love was the very life-breath of his being; of a man of whose goodness we may be assured, there being no better index to a man's worth than the man he honors, for it is the index to a man's ideal of manhood. And from what we know of Tolstoi we may be sure that he would have appreciated this tribute of his coachman above all the encomiums in rhetorical filigree by which his genius has been celebrated. For the acutest of his sorrows was that caused by his failure to attract disciples who would love him enough to practice what he preached. The high principle of his philosophy was love, and this he inspired in the breast of a poor coachman. The love of man for man is one of the rarest of emotions. No one is capable of inspiring it who has not much of divinity in his nature. In the abundance with which Christ excited it his divinity stands revealed. That which distinguishes a high order of man from a low is not the degree of his enlightenment but the degree in which he possesses those qualities of heart that command the reverence and love of his fellows. The highest manhood resides in disposition, not in intellect, and we may be sure that it was not Tolstoi's mental gifts that won for him the love of a servant.

The Clock

The clock struck nine. I looked at Kate, Whose lips were luscious red.
"At quarter after nine I mean To steal a kiss," I said.

She cast a roguish look at me,
And then she whispered low,
With just the sweetest smile, "That clock Is fifteen minutes slow."

Perspective Impressions

President Taft handled the Supreme Court problem with tact and discretion.

We can all agree as to the existing evils, but not as to the method of cure.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox says there is nothing so important as to guard one's tongue. Some people are of the opinion that Ella would be much better off if she knew how to guard her pen.

Dr. Burke's contributions to the literature of love stamp him as a philosopher worthy of association with the immortals whose effusions enrich the editorial page of the Hearst papers.

Getting the World's Fair will be a matter of small moment compared with the task of selecting the candidates for director-general who will be turned down.

Uncle Sam has one hundred and one millions of nephews and nieces and he's on pretty good terms with all of them.

The indications are that the Supreme Court of the United States will continue to be a self-respecting tribunal notwithstanding the curious prevalent conception of progressiveness.

The Supreme Court of Wisconsin has decided that a debt for advertising in a Sunday newspaper is not collectible at law because as the publication of the matter was not a work of necessity it was contrary to law. So it appears that even a Sabbatarian may not scruple at cheating his neighbor.

The Amazing Emperor, Heliogabalus

By J. Stuart Hay

"I would never have written the life of Antoninus Impurissimus," said Lampridius, "were it not that he had predecessors." Even in Latin the task was difficult. In English it would be impossible. There are subjects that permit of a hint, particularly if it be masked to the teeth, but there are others that no art can drape, not even the free use of Latin substantives. Our task, therefore, is to deal rather with their sins of omission, than with the biographers' offences against all canons of good taste in recording the inexpressible. In his work on the Caesars, Suetonius displayed the beasts simply without adding any descriptive placards. Therein lay Suetonius' advantage; he was able to describe; nowadays a writer may not—at least not the character we possess of Elagabalus.

Were we to accept, unexamined, the testimony of his traducers of the Christian era, we should gather that "at the feet of that painted boy Elephantis and Parrhasius could have sat and learned a lesson," that apart from that phase of his sovereignty, he was a little Sardanapalus, an Asiatic Mignon, who found himself great. Of course, it would have been curious to see him in that wonderful palace, clothed like a Persian queen, insisting that he should be addressed as Imperatrix, and quite living up to the title. It would not only have been interesting—it would have given one an insight into how much Rome saw, and how much she could endure.

Lampridius himself drew breath once to remark that he could not vouch for the truth of the stories he was committing to paper; but he was employed to show the contrast between Constantine's superstitions, as some one described them, and those of the ancient world; so he went on to record things even more impossible. Perhaps his remark was unnecessary, for his record has defeated its own end. He has come down to posterity as the biographer whose contradictory collection of scandalous enumerations becomes monotonous rather than amusing as he gets deeper into the mire.

Since the world began, no one has been wholly wicked, no one wholly good. The truth about Elagabalus must lie between the two extremes, admitting, however, a congenital twist towards the evil tendencies of his age. He had habits which are regarded by scientists less as vices than perversions, but which, at the time, were accepted as a matter of course. By birth a Syrian, by profession high priest of the sun, whose devotees worshipped the Phallus as chief symbol, was it likely that Elagabalus, the chief exponent of that worship, should remain cold—should take no interest in what was an all-absorbing topic? Besides this the family was corrupted by the presence of a living fire in their veins, engendered by the perpetual heat of the sun. Consider the history of his relations, and no one will wonder that he was by nature voluptuous. But it was not his voluptuousness that the world minded—it was the abnormal condition of his mind. In form he was attractive and exceedingly graceful; his hair, which was very fair, glistened like gold in the sun; he was slender, and possessed of glorious blue eyes, which in turn were endowed with the power of attracting all beholders to his worship. And he knew his power over men. First he had realized it when the legionaries flocked to the temple at Emesa, attracted by the reports of this Prince Charming.

As Emperor he had no desire to abstain from studying, and imitating, that swift, vivid, violent age when what Mill in his essay on liberty desired was enjoyed by the Augustitudes: "There was no check on the growth of personality, no grinding down of men to meet the average."

Not that any one has ever accused Elagabalus of being average. In no particular can he be considered mediocre. Perhaps his life and habits were not those to which the virile Roman world was addicted, despite the fact that Hadrian had deified in Antoninus not a lad, but a lust, whose worship, half a century later, Tertullian noted was still popular. Since that time Christian diatribes of all kinds have been levelled against the pagans of the decadence, merely because their atriums dripped, not blood, but metaphysics.

Were it permitted to examine Elagabalus' extravagances in print we should at once realize that they are those common to all animals at the age of puberty (in a greater or less degree), where instinct has not associated the developing powers with any one special person or thing, but exaggerated by the traits of his heredity and surroundings. What character should we expect from a child of nature today if he were free with an unbounded liberty and rich beyond the efforts of imagination, to say nothing of a congenitally perverted instinct? The more one sifts the records, the clearer it appears that Elagabalus' actions were those of an incredibly generous person, instinctively trusting, open-hearted and affectionate—a mighty contrast, both in his pleasures and his punishments, to the persons who had preceded him and to his successors.

The example he set in tolerance of opinions not his own, his reluctance to punish those who opposed him, must have led men to expect great things from his manhood. Alone of all the Emperors, he stands out with the proud boast that no murder for political or avaricious purposes can be laid to his charge. There were a few executions, amongst the adherents of Macrinus, rendered necessary by attempts to take the crown from the new Emperor, but despite the fact of serious provocation, his amnesty to the Senate and to Rome for their participation in the usurpation (as they called it) of Macrinus and his son, was scrupulously kept. In religious matters (his special domain) no one can say that he was apathetic; yet there is no recorded instance of persecution, even by fathers of the Church. His whole life was devoted to the introduction of a fantastic eastern monotheism, designed to extinguish the pantheistic atheism which permeated Roman society. Undoubtedly opposition and bitterness would have been raised if the Emperor had not shown a moderation foreign to his years—unless he had exercised a restraining influence over the mob still thirsting for the blood of the Judaisers, as later records demonstrate.

In one particular, however, we are told that Elagabalus was fierce, namely, in the contradiction of his pleasures, none of which can in fairness be said to have affected the outside world. He might have been led, certainly he could not be driven. What Antonine could?

With a singular lack of consistency, Lampridius ascribes all Elagabalus' moderation to his grandmother, Maesa, all his excesses to his own fault, whereas psychologists can demonstrate, from a mass of similar cases, that both his virtues and excesses are those usually exhibited by one of his temperament.

Undoubtedly Maesa's influence in the executive government was a predominating factor, but considering the state of autonomy which the machine had then reached, and the large influence exerted by favorites, it cannot be said that she was supreme; indeed, on more than one occasion we see the boy of fourteen years opposing her influence most strenuously, especially after she had hoodwinked him into appointing Alexian as his coadjutor in the Empire. It was pitiable then, to see the old lady's efforts to retain his position. This, however, she only managed to do by persuading the troops to mutiny and slay her grandson. There is not much to be said for either party, but Elagabalus obviously found relations tedious pack of people, and their influence, like drugs, best taken in small quantities.

Quite a cursory study of authorities on psychology, such as Kraft-Ebing, Forel, Moll, etc., will show us that characters like Elagabalus have occasionally appeared, and are still known in history. They are almost curiosities of nature, and are rarely, if ever, responsible for their own instincts; neither are they cruel or evil by nature. To the vulgar minded all persons who present deformities, whether physical or mental, are subjects of derision and hatred. To those who realize something of the disabilities under which these unfortunates are laboring, they are the objects of either active or passive sympathy. In the abstract, of course, should the insane, the leprous, even the man of genius, get in our way we, as normal persons, feel ourselves justified in ridding the world of its nuisance. It is then that the instinct of fear, rather than that of justice, spur us on, to use the collective strength of the average to exaggerate the abnormalities of the few; but is not a high or noble instinct—this fear that has led men for many centuries through a mire of cruelty, superstition, and deceit, and it is under this lack of justice that the memory of Elagabalus has long suffered. No credit has been given him for the quality of mercy which he revealed though an absurd charge of cruelty has been preferred, on the ground that he occasionally took luncheon in the circus during the progress of the games—his biographer gratuitously assuming (for purposes of vilification) that it was only done when there were criminals to be executed. Another absurd charge of cruelty has been raised on account of his passion for flowers, of which says Lampridius, such masses fell from panels in the ceiling that many guests were smothered—an obvious exaggeration, unless the guests were paralytics or suicidal maniacs.

There was nothing sinister about Elagabalus' feasts, nothing after the style of Domitian's little supper parties, where all was basaltic—walls, ceilings, linen, slaves—parties to which every one worth knowing was ultimately bidden, and, as usual in state functions, every one that was bidden came, only to find a broken column, inscribed with a too familiar name, behind his allotted couch and Domitian talking very wittily about the prescriptions and headsmen he had arranged for each Caligula and Vitellius had been famous as hosts but the feasts that Elagabalus gave outranked theirs for sheer splendor. His guests certainly suffered from his passion for teasing, and to him with the Emperor in such a mood was no Sybaritic enjoyment. He might serve you with wax game, and sweets of crystal, the counterparts of what he was eating himself, and expect close by the somber-hued iron gate of the churchyard, in the eastern outskirts of the village, there had sat, within the memory of an old woman huckster with baskets of eggs and cheese which she offered for the passer-by. When trade was dull and motionless on her little stool, leaning her back against the iron grating, she reminded one of a Flemish painting, with her old scamed eyes and snow-white hair, in sharp contrast to the deep red-hooded mantle she wore.

The Lost Chord

By H. Billinger (From the German)

Counted eighty years of life, had never known her occupation nor its location and it constituted the poetry of her existence. Her prayers, her sympathy and her tears were as dead that passed her silently by in the night. If the burial was that of a poor and poor person, without flowers and mourners, she died her acutely and she wept; if that of a rich person and attended by all the usual display of ostentatious grief, she wept but more copiously—her tribute to an awe-inspiring spectacle. If by chance the wind was cold and carried to her ears a grave-song, a requiem accompanied by the soft rustle of falling willow tree, and if the evening or early sun shone warmly on her head, the old woman was in the seventh heaven of bliss and contentment. But alas, rarely indeed were such conditions hers! The poor died more than the rich and for six months of the year the wind blew sharp about her ears and the snow pattered down on her wide spread-umbrella.

All her sympathy and affection were given to the dead that remained inside the cemetery gate, and naturally was none left for anyone outside.

The wailing of a poor woman deplored the high price of eggs, which she must buy for her sick child, moved the old woman not in the least. Nor did she heed the grumbling of the huckster, who, fond of her cheeses, were compelled, in order to a temporary financial stringency, to show indulgence in that delicacy. The long, hungry eyes of little children she met with an impassiveness—for poverty, hunger and cold were such usual things to her that she gave no further thought on them. She extended credit to no one and would not come for one penny from her price, no matter what she was brought to bear, nor was she ever able to raise it when her customer appeared unusually prosperous. She was just, this old woman, inexorably just, alike in her dealings with her speech. None could say that she had ever given them a kind word in order to receive their patronage; quite the reverse, for if one uttered a little pleasantry such as: "My, but the weather has turned out very small today!" her answer was: "Go get a tape measure and we shall see."

One beautiful autumn morning the old woman was already at her post when there appeared on the steps of an old house opposite, a lank, unkempt, unwashed boy of perhaps five or six. Tow-headed and bow-legged, he stood looking about him with a manner grotesquely unbecoming for one of his size. He carried a piece of cloth, the end of which was fashioned as a bag, and from his little shoulders there hung a large tin pail. The eyes of the old woman and the child met. It were difficult indeed to imagine anyone older or one still younger engaged in the struggle for a living. Of this, however, neither thought. The bow legs of the little fellow began to move and carried him directly to the old woman and in front of her basket of apples.

"Say, give us an apple!" he said, wasting no time on the polite amenities that constitute social greeting.

"God forbid!" gasped the old woman, petrified at his audacity. After an ominous pause the boy departed to pursue his occupation—that of gathering refuse from the streets.

During the afternoon he returned, staggering under the weight of the now filled pail. Again he was irresistibly drawn toward the tempting basket of red-checked apples. He gazed long and earnestly at them and, finally turning to the old woman, who was keeping a sharp lookout, said:

"I'll give you something from my pail, if you like—"

"And I'll give you something, too," she declared with emphasis, "if you don't clear out!" And she strengthened her remark with a certain unmistakable movement of her hand, which left no doubt as to her meaning. "Pfui Teufel! Away with your trash!" she ordered.

The boy, somewhat crestfallen, sneaked away.

The next morning found him there again. A funeral procession was passing and the old woman was weeping. He waited patiently until her grief had subsided, then abruptly asked: "Say, will you give me an apple when I am dead?"

"Dead people have no use for apples!" she informed him.

"But I will," he insisted.

"The devil's own imp!" she cried, exasperated beyond endurance. "One cannot even look on a funeral in peace. Get out, I tell you!"

The next time, he halted before the new filled basket of eggs. "Where do these all come from?" he asked, and, as the old woman did not reply, he answered the question himself: "Oh, I know—from hens. It is very nice of hens to lay such nice eggs."

"That's what hens are for!" grumbled the old woman. After a pause, during which the little fellow thought deeply, he announced: "I'm sure I couldn't do it even if I was a hen!"

Although this was an undoubted tribute to the excellence of her wares, the old woman received it in grim, ungracious silence.

Another time he came running up almost breathless and, seemingly in the greatest excitement, said: "Say, you! There on the corner stands a lady calling to you! She wants you right away!" he added with decision.

"Well, go and tell her to come here, if she wants me."

The little liar went, but returned not.

One day a lady dressed in mourning passed the old woman and child. Glancing contemptuously after her, the hucksteress in an attempt to whistle, blew full her sunken cheeks. "Huh!" she ejaculated spitefully. "There's a noble dame for you! Wouldn't even look at one, let alone buy anything! Ah, but we shall go to the same place in the end, my stuck-up missus! Yes, yes, the grave for every last one of us! That thought always gives me joy!"

"Is she one of those that do not work?" asked the little fellow, concerned. "St. Nicholas gives all such a couple from behind," he asserted knowingly, slapping the seat of his trousers.

"My goodness me!" interrupted the old woman. "To think that a living creature should know so little of the world as that! Since when do rich people work, you little fool?" she fairly shrieked, as a full realization of the density of his ignorance came to her.

But he stuck bravely to his opinion. "Father says," he volunteered, in defence thereof, "Work, or a thrashing!" Yes, indeed," he added, nodding his head solemnly.

"Stop your chatter!" cried the old woman. "You are a jackass!"

He was silent a moment and then: "But you will give me an apple now, won't you?"

Her patience exhausted, the hucksteress grasped a rope which she used to tie her baskets together, but the boy took refuge in precipitate flight. Going into the house, he climbed, on all fours, the steep stairs leading to the garret room, which was never locked. Therein stood a bed, a table and a few chairs. The bare floor was filthy and the light came in but dimly through the unwashed window-panes. A few pieces of clothing were strewn about and although there was no fire, the atmosphere was stifling. Fresh air was an unknown quantity here.

In this place the little fellow had passed his babyhood, almost entirely forsaken. Alone all day, he spent most of the time in bed. When his father came home at night they shared their meal together. Seating the child on the table in front of him, the father ate his supper of bread and cheese, now and then putting a bit in the child's mouth. On Sundays he soaped him thoroughly all over, scrubbed him without mercy and then took him along to the tavern. Having reached the mature age of five years, the father had set about to wean him from a life of idleness. When he returned from work—he was a street lamp cleaner—his first glance was at the pail; if it was filled, well and good; if not, the boy received his merited punishment, the administration of which was punctuated by the succinct sophistry: "Work or a beating!" This was the only lesson the boy had learned, the extent of his acquired wisdom, and he believed in it and its justice as happier and more fortunate childhood believes in God.

Although it irritated the old woman more or less to have the little fellow plant himself before her baskets, she unwittingly looked for him if he failed to put in an appearance at the usual time. When he finally came she was curious to hear what new proposition his ingenuity had suggested to him in order to gain the coveted apple. Her fixity of purpose not to yield being, however, equally as strong as his longing, the honors of the contest were, up to the present time, hers.

And now the yellowed leaves from the spreading vines over the churchyard gate began to fall to the ground at the slightest breeze and gathered at the old woman's feet. She drew her mantle tighter about her shoulders, as the branches, gradually bereft of foliage, bared, in the fullness of time, their unprotected nakedness to the fury of the elements. The wheels of

A Catholic for Chief Justice

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Some time ago commenting on the fact that the Premier of Canada was a Catholic and that the late Lord Chief Justice Russell was a Catholic, you said that a Catholic had yet to rise to such distinction in this country. Well now if it be admitted that the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States occupies a more exalted position than the President then it cannot be denied that a Catholic has received as high a distinction in this country as anywhere in the world. Edward Douglass White of Louisiana who has been elevated to the Chief Justiceship is a Catholic. He is moreover a devout Catholic. He is also a graduate of the University of Georgetown, an institution of learning conducted by Jesuits. And now we have two Catholics on the Supreme Bench, for Justice McKenna who was once attorney-general of the United States and who was appointed to the Supreme Court by President McKinley, is also a devout communicant of the Church of Rome. Perhaps the Methodists in Rome who caused Mr. Roosevelt to make an ass of himself on a certain notable occasion will be shocked when they learn that President Taft has so grievously compromised with the terrible Vatican.

Our Absurd Bar Association

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Concurring in all that you have said of late about the degeneracy of our Bar Association I wish to add that confirmation of your observations has come through the outrageous conduct of the young lawyer who made a sensational report the other day about the state of affairs in the police courts. The newspapers have been putting the blame on that fresh and irresponsible young muckraker, but how about the Bar Association that selected three inexperienced men fresh from college for so important a task as that of investigating the conduct of business in the police courts? In this connection I think it worth while to say a few words about those courts. The lawyers of the Bar Association seem to be of the opinion that these courts should be conducted with all the dignity peculiar to the very highest tribunals of justice. Anybody who knows anything about the business transacted by the police magistrates knows that this is impossible. The police magistrates are not expected to inspire the poor wretches that come before them with awe, or with anything savoring of the majesty of the law. Their business is not so much to terrorize as to correct. Better for society that they should assume a paternal, sympathetic attitude toward the weak and erring who come before them than that they should attend to the strict enforcement of the law. It is desirable they should exercise a wise and wide discretion and rather dispense advice and admonition than drastic punishment. It is desirable that they should suspend the rules of evidence and get in touch with the men and women that come before them and with the persons that plead for prisoners whether they be shysters or leaders of the bar. Naturally by following this course, which they do, something of sociability is engendered in the atmosphere of the police courts, and naturally, too, this sort of thing gives rise to occurrences that might easily be misconstrued by cultured young college graduates proud of their membership in an honorable profession and under the impression that all the processes of the law should be accompanied by great dignity and decorum. It is not to be claimed for the police courts that they are free from abuses. But considering the nature of them, considering the depths of degradation that are sounded in them and the tone and character of the persons who devote themselves to police court business it is surprising that the abuses are not much worse than they have been pictured.

Yours truly,

—Thomas L. Britt.

A Question of Newspaper Ethics

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Let me refresh your memory and then put a question to you. In the year 1902 a gang of burglars returning Cypress Lawn Cemetery was pursued by police and a running pistol battle brought Policeman Eugene Robinson. One of the men arrested for the murder was William Henderson. He peached on his pals and by testimony sent them to their deserved punishment. While he was in jail he wooed and won Nellie McAuliffe, the matron of the prison. After his release they quietly departed from the city. Owing to his treachery Henderson was marked for death by the "yeggs" of the States and he was compelled to live in hiding. Some time ago a report came from Canada that he had been discovered and killed there. The matter of fact another man who looked like Henderson had fallen a victim to the vendetta. A short time ago Henderson died after beseeching him to bury her in San Francisco. To fulfill her dying wish Henderson came in disguise to this city and performed last rites over the body of his wife. Of course he took his life in his hands, for it was well known he was best known to the criminal element. He left the city without mishap. Shortly after his departure the Examiner published this in a prominent position on the first page. For the first time it became known to the public and, what is more important, to the "yeggs" William A. Henderson was not dead. His treachery was not yet punished, that the vendetta was still unfulfilled. Doubtless they are now picking up his trail, with what results we are to find out. Now I want to ask you if you think that a newspaper is justified in publishing of this kind. Here is a man who escaped punishment for murder by aiding the law, a despicable character no doubt, but a man to whom I attach probably as precious as it is to you and me. Will not the Examiner have refrained from publishing the avenging "yeggs" on his trail? And if he is killed by them, will not the newspapermen be responsible for the publication of the news which will suffer some uneasy hours when they are asked with their conscience?

Very respectfully,

December 9.

Sixteen Deaths in Prize Ring

In all the history of the prize ring, according to the New York World, there has never been recorded in a single year anything approaching the number of deaths directly due to boxing contests that have occurred during the past twelve months. Sixteen fighters have died as a result of ring accidents and two more are now lying at the point of death. Three of the sixteen boxers died in California—one, Tommy McCarthy, in San Francisco following his fight with Owen Moran, and two of lesser fame in Fresno. The rest of the fatalities are spread over the continent from the Atlantic Coast to Nicaragua.

No World's Fair in Berlin

Kaiser William, during his visit to the exposition at Brussels, spoke his mind about the out-broached project of a world's fair for Berlin. The Kaiser thinks that Berlin is no city for a world's fair and gives reasons which will be of interest to Californians, now that this State is straining every nerve to get the Panama world's fair. The Kaiser said: "In the first place it must be confessed Berlin is no place for gayety such as you have here and in Paris—my capital does not even offer London's substitute for such frivolity—I mean in the way of that glut of theaters and other pleasure places, not to mention traveling facilities. Secondly, now that the Tempelhof common is no more, we have no suitable ground within easy reach. An exhibition in the environs, even as near as Potsdam, would be out of the question—the train service, as at present constituted, could not cope with the number which would have to come to make the undertaking a success. I doubt also if Berlin could house such a host of visitors as you seem able to here in Brussels. Thirdly and most important of all, my people are essentially a race of workers. We work in Berlin (thank God for it!) with such zeal that the classes are only free on Sunday and in our country an exhibition could not be main open that day. Berlin would not be powerful enough with foreigners to warrant such a scheme. We Germans always show a leading hand in international exhibitions outside our own country and that we shall, by the grace of God, continue to do, but at the same time we cannot help play the host ourselves."

A Classic by Twain

A letter writer addressing the editor of a New York paper complains that one of the great Mark Twain's speeches has never been reprinted from the newspaper files. He says it was delivered at a dinner given in honor of John

Is your pencil a "KOH-I-NOOR" or an imitation? Genuine "KOH-I-NOORS" are made by "L. & C. Hardtmuth," in Austria.—J. Crocker, 450 Market St., San Francisco

Choate just before he went to London as ambassador and laments the fact that it cannot be found in Twain's "complete" works. Here are extracts from the speech:

"Across the chasm of the ages we grasp the oyster by the hand and call him brother, but further and still further back we go and breathe the germ we cannot see and know in him our truer Adam. * * * Look at the telephone, which enables a man to stand in New York and speak with another on the summit of the Andes and make remarks which would not be safe at a shorter range. * * * So we progressed from fishes into reptiles; reptiles into Russians. * * * The preachers tend in their remarks to point with scorn at the Pitiless Prince of Perdition. Excuse me, Mr. Chairman. Far be it from me to pass remarks upon a country and potentate with whom these United States have always been on the closest and warmest terms."

High Prices in Greece

Tariff revision and the high cost of living are now burning issues in Greece and are figuring prominently in the election which takes place this month. From the report of the American Consul-General at Athens the following is gleaned:

"Tariff revision is now agitating the people, and a commission has been appointed to revise the schedule. There is a demand for foodstuffs, which are our principal exports to Greece. The tariff on these imports is low, but the tariff on manufactured articles is high. The high cost of living is also a burning question. A laborer gets 60 cents a day. A clerk earns about $1.25. In Athens one can get what might be called a fairly good house for $60 a month. A family can be kept modestly on $20 a week. Greece produces olive oil, raisins, wine, and figs. In many cases laborers live on coarse bread and olive oil. Wine is very cheap and much of it is consumed."

This goes to show that "the high cost of living" is an elastic term that will fit a marvelous variety of conditions.

Newspapers and Divorce

A Divorce Commission has been taking testimony in London and the representatives of the London press whose testimony has been taken are pretty well agreed that the reporting of divorce cases should be limited in regard to details and unsavory facts. A strong feeling was found to exist among newspapermen with high ideals that the publication of full reports was the most serious punishment to the offenders who feared publicity more than the outcome of the divorce action. Nevertheless they thought that the present way of reporting divorce cases ought to be changed and suggested that papers be allowed to give only the summing up of the presiding judge which covers the salient facts of the action. It seems likely that some sort of censorship will be devised.

Sees Himself at 90 for First Time

Up in Nevada City there is a Chinese who, according to the Sacramento Bee, reached the age of ninety before ever having the pleasure of seeing his reflection in a mirror. His name is Ah Wah and he was arrested for blasting fish. In the sheriff's office is a large plate glass mirror which casts a full length reflection. This mirror is directly opposite the entrance to the room. As he entered the room for the first time Ah Wah saw his reflection. Thinking it was another Chinese he advanced with extended hand, talking in his native tongue. His hand touched the glass. He was startled, stepped back in surprise and pointing at himself and then at the reflection, said in amazed tones, "Me! Me!" Ah Wah came here in pioneer days.

The Spectator

The Discovery of Luiza

Tut! tut! Mrs. Anna Pratt Simpson! Take your dainty foot off the loud pedal please when sounding your own praises. You are not one of the least of our parochial critics; you know a good voice from a bad, and something of the musical art, too, and therefore you are one of the few critics of "the art that wakes the soul" hereabouts, who are not presumptuous when they write of the mysteries of the concord of sweet sounds; but my dear Mrs. Simpson you deviate somewhat from accuracy when you picture yourself as you do in the Call as one who stood alone among the local critics in your joy of discovering Tetrizzini on her first appearance in San Francisco. Right you are when you say that Ashton Stevens and Peter Robertson were not alert to the qualities that entitle her to rank with the top-notch prima donnas, but there were others not less enthusiastic than yourself about the perfection of the little Italian diva's art. This is not a question of very great importance, this question of the credit due for the ability to appreciate a voice of exquisite cultivation, but it is important that so distinguished an authority as yourself should be redeemed from error even in a matter quite trivial. And therefore I will perform a gratuitous service in the interest of one of the sublimest things in the world—the plain truth.

Documentary Evidence

There is no better proof to be offered in support of any proposition than documentary evidence. This kind of proof is available for my purpose. In Town Talk of February 18, 1905, page thirteen, there is a paragraph, which, though it is not in the nature of a critique of the vocal art, shows pretty conclusively that I was under no misapprehension regarding Tetrizzini. The paragraph was written apropos of a sentiment expressed by that most conscientious of critics, Miss Frances Joliffe, in an article with reference to Madame Melba. It may be found to have something of historical interest at this time. This is the paragraph:

"I quote from a musical critique in a daily paper: 'A few blocks down the street a little Italian woman was singing that scene (the mad scene from Lucia) with all the brilliancy, fire and faults of the wonderful Italian method.' Nothing is more amusing to me than the curiously undisguised, exuberant egotism of the criticisms of some of our music authorities. They are eloquent of the wild and woolly culture of this provincial burg. The lady referred to, with the faulty Italian method, is Tetrizzini. To write that she has faults is to imply that the writer knows what those faults are. Will the critic please tell us what they are? I have only a vague notion of what constitutes the perfection of the vocal art, and I have tried to discern flaws in Tetrizzini's method, but in vain. To my untrained perception there is nothing in her suave vocalization to cavil over. Her singing appears to be as spontaneous and effortless as that of a canary. Hers appears to be the art that conceals art. She has evidently mastered the technique of breathing, because her respiration never interferes with the smoothness of her tone production. My ear tells me that her registers are so perfectly blended that all her tones are of the same full, sonorous, resonant quality. She sustains a note fully as long as any reasonable score would demand, and she seems to have not the slightest difficulty with any florid passage. In other words she seems to have mastered the true art of song, but being an Italian the presumption is that her method is of the Italian school which some purveyor of claptrap—probably a German—has described as faulty. That the critic knows not whereof she writes I am inclined to think, for in that same critique she lavished praise on Melba's perfect art. She was probably laboring under the delusion that as Melba was a pupil of Madame Marchesi of Paris, the Australian song-bird's method was French. She is probably unaware of the fact that Marchesi learned all she knows about singing from Nicolai, an Italian, and Garcia, a gentleman who advocated the glottis stroke which is now generally acknowledged to be fatal to any vocal organ. Melba's method is Tetrizzini's method—the proper one—and it belongs to no country."

An Interview

The truth about Tetrizzini's first engagement in San Francisco is that very few of the people who applauded and praised her singing regarded her as a prima donna of the first rank. The only people that gave her unstinted praise, and who cared naught for comparisons, were the residents of the Latin Quarter, who infused warmth and fragrance into the old Tivoli. And of the newspapers there was only one that realized the importance of the contribution to the history of music in San Francisco that was made by the Italian diva. That one was Town Talk. For proof of this assertion I will once more overcome my native modesty and call attention to the fact that in these columns, in the issue of November 25, 1905, I chided the whole community for its neglect of a great artist. Tetrizzini's engagement was at an end. She was no longer a topic of discussion. She was living at a second-rate hotel in Ellis street, and was about to leave San Francisco. I sought and obtained an interview with her, which was an unusual thing to do on the eve of an artist's departure. Personages of the stage are interviewed, if at all, on their arrival. My deviation from convention I explained thus: "I have reflected that if some Queen of State, or of society, who had been sojourning in this beautiful city, were about to say good bye, there would be much concern over the impending event. And yet a woman versed in the divine art of song, a singer whose glad, incomparable notes have recently augmented so much of our joy of living, was to be permitted to go hence without any public demonstration of regret. I felt humiliated that this community should be so niggard of its gratitude, and in a spirit of vicarious contrition, I called on Luiza Tetrizzini to apologize for the whole sordid city."

Her Past

There was much said during that interview, a little of which I will repeat for the bearing that it has on something that I read in the Examiner last Tuesday. One of that paper's critics opines that Tetrizzini has improved since her former visit and he suggests that the improvement is due to her association meanwhile with great artists. Now of course Tetrizzini has not improved to any perceptible degree. The probability is that she hasn't improved, for singers who have attained anything approximating perfection in their art are not likely to improve after reaching Tetrizzini's age. And as to her having improved by reason of association that is of course sublimated nonsense, for she hasn't associated with anybody capable of imparting anything that she hadn't known. Furthermore long before coming to San Francisco she associated with greater artists than she has met since. In her interview with me she told me that she had sung with Tomagno in the Argentino Theater in Rome, that she had sung seven seasons in St. Petersburg and Moscow where she was in the same company with Caruso, a company, we may be sure, far superior to the companies of mediocrities and beauties that have been catering of late to the vulgar plutocracy of New York. She also sang in Berlin with Sembrich when Sembrich was in her prime. Tetrizzini, by the way, comes from a musical family. Her sister, Eva, was a great dramatic soprano and she married Director Campanini of the famous La Scala Theater of Milan, brother of Campanini, the tenor.

A Tetrizzini Criticism

For the following I am indebted to a friend who says that it is a composite of all the criticisms that he read in the daily papers: She sang for us. Is it not wonderful that she sang for us? I am knocked silly by her condescension in singing for us. But after all we discovered her. You remember that night when we all sat in the dear old cute little Tivoli and discovered her. Never was such an event since Colombo discovered America. But I should not mention Colombo, for Tetrizzini is greater than Colombo. She is the greatest woman in the world. There will never be anyone as great as she is. I am sorry I used all my superlatives on the Bevani singers. I should have saved them for Tetrizzini. I never heard the superb "Chile con carne" aria from Risotto's wonderful opera "Tagliarini" sung so overpoweringly. Pardon my egotism in mentioning it, but I heard Vesta Victoria sing it in A flat—never mind when; but Tetrizzini sings it in O naturel and her billowy high Cs rolled up, wave after wave, and submerged me. One hypnotized lady near me exploded and said: "It's a high F!" but I knew better and I withered her with a mush of words. There, I think I have hit on the Tetrizzini secret! She reduces us to a mere mush of words and when we put the words on paper the printer pies them. He pies the mush. "When the pie is opened the mush begins to sing." But I am getting mushy and pie-eyed. And I have a right to. Well do I remember that night when I announced that Tetrizzini could sing. Nobody believed me. Peter Robertson jeered at me. Ashton Stevens knocked me down and hissed: "Take that back!" But I stood firm, so Tetrizzini can thank me for her triumph. And such a triumph! There were fifteen thousand people there to hear her. When I revolved my neck on my shoulders and looked them in the face I was amazed that there were so many faces in San Francisco. Actually, everybody present had a face. I saw a few who were two-faced. It was wonderful. And how they clapped. If clapping of hands could produce friction and start a fire we would have burned the town again. But there was no friction and consequently no fire. Just the same it was a remarkable crowd. Some were in evening dress and some were not. Some came on foot and others in street cars and still others in automobiles. Could anything be more wonderful? And then Tetrizzini's gown. Winding around it was an ostrich of Nile green and Fior d'Italia red. The head of the bird was in front and the back of the bird was in back. It was the simplest and the stunningest gown I ever saw, a bird of a gown. I am glad I heard Tetrizzini. I am glad I discovered her ahead of all the other critics. I shall never forget how I rushed to the office that night and shouted at the city editor: "Tetrizzini is the goods!" Oh the rapture, oh the joy, oh the ecstasy, oh the piffle!

"Did he leave footprints on the sands of time?"
"No; but they took his thumb-prints!"

Rudolph's Little Joke

Some of the admirers of Mr. Rudolph Spreckels are going about these days asking their friends if they have observed the joke that he is playing on his brother John D. The joke, it appears, consists in the use of the editorial columns of the Call to agitate for the reduction of car fare from five to three cents. He is conducting this agitation, it is said, for the purpose of killing two birds with one stone. The two birds are the United Railroads and Mr. John D. Spreckels. For be it understood Mr. Spreckels owns the traction system in San Diego. Now of course the probability is that should San Francisco decide to follow the example of Cleveland other cities in the State would do likewise. There is nothing so contagious as schemes for the cinching of public service corporations. It was believed, by the way, when Mr. Claus Spreckels died, that Rudolph was shorn of the influence in the Call office which he had wielded during the graft prosecution. For immediately thereafter the Call's moral enthusiasm abated perceptibly. But according to the gossip of newspaperdom the men that are running the Call for John D. are far more intimate with Rudolph than with their employer.

Rudolph and His Leg-Mate

According to Willis J. Abbott, Washington correspondent for several papers, formerly of Bryan's Commoner, Mr. Rudolph Spreckels made his recent visit to the capital in the capacity of chief of the Anti-Graft Association of the United States. According to Mr. Fremont Older our sterling patriot has been in Washington boosting the Fair project, but Mr. Abbott has another story to tell in his correspondence. Mr. Abbott gives one the impression that Mr. Spreckels was merely on parade with Mr. Older, who, (described as the editor that was kidnapped by the men who tried to break down the reform government in San Francisco) was doing service similar to that which is rendered by the monkey to the man with the hand organ. I learn from Mr. Abbott that the celebrated graft crusader is reported in the East to have espoused the cause of Joe Folk of Missouri and to be engaged in pressing his candidacy for the Presidency to the front. "I asked Governor Folk about that nearly two months ago," says Abbott, "and he denied it vociferously." "Within two or three days I asked Mr. Spreckels the same question, and met the same denial, although I must say it was not quite as strenuous." Now what does this mean? Why was Folk vociferous? Does he think it would be fatal to be known as one of Rudolph's proteges?

Shunned by the Wise

Perhaps the explanation is to be found in some of Mr. Abbott's observations. "The matter of an anti-graft association," he says, "seems to be almost like an association to give effect to two or three of the ten commandments. I noticed today that the men who called on Mr. Spreckels were in almost every case sentimentalists in politics. There were some big men, as for example Fells who has given $100,000 toward the single-tax movement. But the Senators and representatives did not seem to be present." Perhaps the truth about our graft prosecution has been slowly penetrating the fastnesses of the distant East, and as a consequence Mr. Spreckels who has none but the sycophantic for companions at home has none but the long-haired of crankdom to do him reverence in foreign parts. Yet it may be as Mr. Abbott puts it: "Everybody is naturally against graft and does not feel it necessary to advertise himself and his virtues on that particular line." Thus naively does Mr. Abbott convey the impression that the great chief of the Anti-Graft Crusade of the United States is something of a bore with the infectious seeds of that tired feeling on his exquisite person. Not a very good man to send to Washington to boost for the Fair.

The Wickedness of Joaquin Miller

Over in Alameda County where culture is so plentiful that the favored inhabitants do everything but butter their bread and sweeten their coffee with it, there flourishes a society of fine spirits known as the Alameda County Press Association. It is not, as its name might be taken to mean, an aggregation of newspaper people. It is made up of poets who have never been published and fictionists who have been striving for years to break into the magazines. One of the leading lights of this society is James Henry MacLafferty, a "pote" who outwits posterity by publishing his "pomes" at his own expense. At the last meeting of the Alameda County Press Association somebody brought up the project of acquiring land and founding a literary colony in the neighborhood of "The Heights" where Joaquin Miller communes with his soul. The project was acclaimed with enthusiasm by everybody except MacLafferty. MacLafferty would have none of it. And he gave his reason. Joaquin Miller, he said, possesses a reputation that is not entirely free from stain. There were stories about Joaquin Miller, he said, which seemed to indicate that on some occasions of his life he had broken the commandments. Hence it would hurt the spotless reputations of the members of the Alameda County Press Association if they took up their abode in Joaquin's neighborhood. With a shudder each and every member joined his voice to MacLafferty's in condemnation of the project.

An Erring Editor

There is so much that is edifying in my esteemed contemporary, the Argonaut, so little to justify demurrer, so much that commands concurrence, so little that provokes dissent, that when I find the amiable editor nodding I am reluctant to obtrude upon his slumbers. But as I have taken a personal interest and a pontifical attitude in the case of the late Rev. C. R. Brown of Oakland; nay having pointed with pride to the circumstance of my having hastened that darling pulpiteer's resignation from the First Congregational Church, I feel that in justice to myself I ought not to sit idly by while my safe, sane and self-satisfied contemporary screws up his indignation under the misapprehension that a man deserving of high esteem has suffered cruel injustice at the hands of the press. Also I feel that since my esteemed contemporary has taken the seat of the scorner to visit opprobrium on certain newspapers for what he conceives to be a lamentable violation of the decencies of journalism, I may be justified in calling him to task for putting all the blame on the shoulders of two women "one unspeakably foolish, the other unspeakably vain." Thus does my contemporary give rein to what remains in his system of the Old Adam. He would erect a barrier of skirts for the protection of Dr. Brown in imitation of the unchivalrous pastor himself. I submit that this is hardly in strict accordance with the proprieties of journalism.

His Hearsay Testimony

The editor of the Argonaut deeply deplores the mortal wounding "of a man preeminent among us for light and leading, a man of infinite moral capability, a man whose character is as clear as sunlight." Here into the very midst of these sweet rhetorical harmonies I must throw a jangling discord. It is this:—the editor of the Argonaut doesn't know what he's talking about. It is evident to me that his testimony is all hearsay, and I therefore pronounce him an incompetent witness. And as to his criticism of the press for humiliating Dr. Brown, it betrays a strange sophistry which discovers in what he believes to be a calumny a vehicle for another that can hardly be considered less offensive, the calumny involving the women. The indignation of my contemporary rests on the postulate that Dr. Brown is innocent of everything that the gossip concerning him implies. Now he has my assurance for it that Dr. Brown's character isn't as clear as sunlight; that on the contrary Dr. Brown's character is almost as dark as the moon in total eclipse. And I hope that he will not fancy that I have not a clear conception of the difference between character and reputation. If Dr. Brown's character possessed the clearness of sunlight he never would have deemed it expedient to sequester himself behind skirts. In short, the truth is that the good, amiable editor of the Argonaut has not been judicious in his grieving.

The Education of Santa Cruz

William T. Jeter, banker of Santa Cruz and former lieutenant-governor, has accomplished something which will give him a place in the history of the Surf City. He has sponsored what one of the Santa Cruz papers calls "a most interesting French innovation of our fair city." Mr. Jeter has introduced the "marquise" in Santa Cruz. He went before the city council and asked permission to attach a "marquise" to the front of the Santa Cruz County National Bank. One of the mystified councilmen wanted to know what sort of a rigmajig that was. Another of superior intellectual attainments had a hazy idea that the word meant the wife of a marquis and he was puzzled to know how Mr. Jeter would attach her to the bank building. Patiently and without undue ostentation of erudition Mr. Jeter explained just what the alien word stood for. Permission was granted and now that the marquise is being erected, Santa Cruz has taken enthusiastically to "the French innovation." Not to be outdone Fred Swanton is going to have one on his new beach hotel. Thus does Santa Cruz keep abreast of the ultimate wrinkle in metropolitan fashions.

An Impatient Muckraker

Mr. Leo McEnerney of the Bar Association is a young gentleman who has a great deal to learn. Mr. McEnerney does not understand the philosophy of the psychological moment. Having initiated a scheme for the investigation of the police courts, and having had himself appointed chairman of the investigating committee, Mr. McEnerney attacked his work with the enthusiasm of a bear going after honey. He seems to have disregarded the instruction of the Bar Association as to the scope of his work and to have ignored the two young men who were appointed to assist him. And when he had completed his investigations he made a tactical blunder by reporting to a newspaper instead of to the Bar Association. Putting aside the ethical consideration which apparently did not worry Mr. McEnerney, this was all wrong. He had misjudged the psychological moment. We have all been a bit sensitive about local muckraking since our enemies have used our own findings of corruption as an argument in favor of New Orleans in the exposition matter. We are anxious that muckraking should be suspended till the Congress gives its verdict in this important affair. So we did not approve of Mr. McEnerney's impatient expose. We wished that he had gone a bit slower. We were angry to find that he had succeeded in airing views which had no official approval. Decidedly Mr. McEnerney is "in wrong."

The Ethics of His Conduct

Mr. McEnerney has proved himself unworthy of the trust reposed in him by our great Bar Association. The Bar Association, it might be supposed, would pick as its instrument for the reformation of the police courts one in whom devotion to professional ethics took the form of a passion, in whom observance of the proprieties was carried almost to excess. On that supposition it is patent that they misjudged McEnerney. This young man seems to have an appetite for newspaper notoriety. He saw to it that his report should be published before it was placed on file with the Bar Association. As such a report is a confidential document until the body for which it was prepared sees fit to make it public, McEnerney placed himself in the position of one who prefers advertising to duty. But that was not all. When his premature publication brought a storm about his head, he called prevarication to his assistance. In his attempt to explain how the report had reached a newspaper without his consent he cut a sorry figure. Mr. McEnerney has incurred the censure of the Bar Association and he has not endeared himself to the newspaper men. He has sacrificed his ethical scruples for a nice mess of pottage. It will be a long time before any newspaper advertises Mr. McEnerney again.

Los Angeles' Shrewd Chief of Police

The newspapermen who were sent from this city to Los Angeles to cover the "Times" dynamite case tell several good stories about Chief of Police Galloway of the southern city. One of the scribes was mightily impressed by his first interview with the chief. He was ushered into the police sanctum and found Galloway sitting at his desk wearing an expression of profound thoughtfulness. When the reporter explained his mission the chief cleared his throat, spread a sheet of paper before him, took up his pencil and said: "My study of this case convinced me that it should be approached from two sides." Illustrating his words by emphatic pencil dashes at the paper the chief continued: "What I may call the first premise is, Did an explosion actually occur? I detailed several of the best men in my department to investigate and after careful scrutiny of the situation they reported to me that an explosion had actually occurred." Pausing for a moment to allow the reporter to appreciate this Sherlock Holmes feat the chief resumed: "Having disposed of the first premise, I then went on to the second which may be stated thus: What man or men or body of men was or were guilty of causing the explosion?" The reporter was full of attention. "I am still working on the second premise."

And Just Then the Seat Broke

The audience at the Savoy on Monday night was being carefully led along to the point of tears. Feelings had been harrowed by Raymond's address to the jury, emotions had been stirred by the collapse of Madame X. The lump was in the throat, the mist was before the eyes of the audience. The crucial moment had arrived. Raymond clasped Madame X in his arms and sobbed "Mother!" It was the instant when pentup tears should flow, when handkerchiefs should be wetted. But at that ticklish moment charged with the emotional appeal of the play, a divan seat on the left aisle broke under the weight of a fat man with a noise like a pistol shot. It was a counter-irritant and there were no more tears.

Saw a Rabbit

In his recent unsuccessful rencontre with Robin in the bar of the St. Francis, Walter Terry has hardly been himself. The passage induced a nervous attack which Walter's proposed prescriptions seem rather to have induced than allayed. In such unsatisfactory condition has he been that I doubt whether he recently written a line of that much-heralded which will create a sensation in San Francisco society when it appears, if it ever does appear. In fact I do not think that Walter has taken a pen in hand recently; and a little evidence he had at the St. Francis a few nights later increased his disinclination to dally with writing materials. He entered the hotel late and in a highly nervous condition. To the desk he demanded a room and was handed a pen by one of the clerks. He started to register, but suddenly threw the pen down in great trepidation and drew back from the desk. "What is the matter, Mr. McCreery?" asked the clerk. "Didn't you see that white rabbit jump at me from the register?" was the amazing counter-query.

"Prince" Peterson Returns

How many old-timers recognize in the staid and self-contained R. C. A. Peterson who came into town a few days ago the "Prince" Peterson of twenty years back? Years have subdued the wild gayety of the erstwhile "prince," but I doubt whether he has ceased to be the good-hearted fellow of yore. In those old days when he was a familiar figure at the Palace and the Occidental, the "prince" had oodles of money and spent it with the profusion of a Monte Cristo. At frequent intervals he would steam into town from Honolulu, which was his family home, and proceed to make things merry along the Rialto. Nobody who was the "prince's" guest could spend any money and it was not an uncommon sight to see him riding through the midnight streets in a cab with two empty cabs trailing behind. He knew where to find the choice spirits and before morning the empty cabs would be full of hilarious sharers of the Peterson prodigality. It used to be said that the "prince" never left town till he was broke and usually Jules Gamage, the collector of bad debts, would be at the steamer to arrest him as he departed. Once he submitted to arrest, just to teach Jules a lesson, and as he had no intention in the world of defrauding anybody and had a generous exchequer to draw on in the islands, he was released in time to get aboard the steamer. Of course he "blew in" his big inherited fortune. Then he disappeared, to reappear the other day from Mexico where he has accumulated another fortune.

"A NATION'S CRIME"

Such is the title of the new novel which has just come from the pen of Mrs. I. Lowenberg, the author of "The Irresistible Current," which created such a stir and much comment among the readers of books about a year ago.

Mrs. Lowenberg has shown in the book just issued that she has given a great deal of thought to social problems, and that she is a woman true of heart, with fine ideals, to whom has been given the gift of rare intelligence and the power of expression.

In "A Nation's Crime" which shows the lack of uniformity in the divorce laws of the several States of the Union, Mrs. Lowenberg has taken occasion to point out by a forceful story the imperative necessity for the remedying of the existing laxity in this regard.

The story is crowded with incidents, the dialogue is lively and the novel is sure to attract attention and cause discussion among thoughtful readers.

The book is now on sale at all book-stores.

Mrs. Miller Graham's Trouble

From a correspondent in London I have just received word that the agent of Mrs. William Miller Graham of Santa Barbara is having a great deal of difficulty in leasing a town house for the next season. Before Mrs. Graham left London she gave her agent minute instructions as to what she wanted and how much she was willing to pay for it and he has been busy ever since trying to execute his commission. His difficulty springs principally from the fact that owing to the coronation which will take place next year, there are very few desirable London houses to let. There has been a brisk demand for the very few really famous houses which, it is thought, the owners may be willing to rent, and fabulous prices are being asked and obtained. Mrs. Graham first negotiated for Mrs. George Keppel's new house in Grosvenor Square, but nothing seems to have come of her efforts. Now it comes to light that overtures were made on her behalf to obtain Stafford House, the town house of the Duke of Sutherland, which is one of London's most famous palaces. It is said that a most munificent offer was made for this place, but it was not considered. The Duke of Sutherland is reported to have rebuffed all advances with the statement that "he is not in the habit of letting his home." I understand that Mrs. Graham's agent is still trying to find an available house.

Joe and Vesta Didn't Speak

Joe Eastland dropped into town very quietly a few days ago. After returning from abroad he stayed in New York for some time, trying to screw his courage to the sticking-place and to steel his nerves to the ordeal of facing his friends in this city. Joe realizes now that it was foolish to send those cablegrams to the newspapers announcing his engagement to Vesta Shortridge Bruguere, but like the average man he does not enjoy being twitted for his foolishness. He dreaded the "kidding" to which he would be subjected on his return. So he came to town without a flourish of trumpets and took an apartment at the St. Francis. It happened that the vivacious Vesta had come up from Monterey and that she too was registered at the St. Francis. But when they met unexpectedly in a corridor Joe was careful to look the other way and Vesta said no word. And she quickly returned to Monterey. Eastland's feelings have been so hurt by the stress of the whole incident that his friends have been considerate enough to spare him references to it.

Mrs. "Billy" Mein Is Coming

Society across the bay has been eagerly awaiting the arrival of Mrs. "Billy" Mein. When word reached here that she was about to return to her old home, there was general rejoicing and an immediate formulation of all sorts of plans for her entertainment. Mrs. William Mein is a daughter of Gardner Williams who used to be called "the diamond king" by his friends across the bay. After her marriage to one of the popular Mein boys she went to South Africa where "Billy" achieved fame and fortune as a mining engineer. But the pull of home was strong and although Mein had reached the zenith of his ambition and was receiving a salary of $25,000 a year, he gave up his South African connections when his wife expressed a desire to return to the United States. Such instances of devotion are rare in husbands nowadays, but Mrs. "Billy" Mein is a woman worth such chivalrous sacrifices. She attended the coming-out party of Miss Helen Taft in Washington recently and made a sensation. Instead of arriving as the other women did in a maze of wraps she stepped out of her limousine uncovered and entered the room where the reception took place, a radiant beauty glowing with an enthusiasm that warmed all beholders. She made so deep an impression that all the society editors devoted special space to descriptions of her arrival and appearance.

Our Richest Young Man

"What eligible young man in society is richest in his own name?" was the query put to me a few days ago and I promptly confessed my ignorance on this very important subject. My informant answered the question by stating that Douglas Grant, the son of Joseph D. Grant was the chap in this enviable situation. I learned that young Grant's mother, the first wife of Joseph D. Grant, left her son a large fortune when she died, a fortune that runs to so many figures that there is no youth about town whose bank book shows anything approaching it. Young Grant has been a little wild, as might be expected, but he is beginning to settle down and who knows but that he may fall a victim to the charm of some lovely girl before long. As an instance of his devotion to duty I was told that he gets up at six o'clock in the morning in order to reach his business on time. How many of our wealthy youngsters can say as much? A lot of them are getting their first sound sleep about six in the morning.

Mrs. McKim's Reno Celebration

hood alleviate the tedium of their exile, it is far from surprising to learn that they are giving for elaborate parties. Why shouldn't they? A divorce is only a petty incident in the lives of some of them—an incident which inspires them with anything but sorrow. It is the door through which they escape to the joy of living and have no inclination to tread its threshold in cloth and ashes. Is it not natural, therefore, that they should give balls? And having plenty of money, why shouldn't they give balls that do the eyes of the simple Nevadans among whom they temporarily abide? Most of them, as a matter of plain fact, have more money than brains. But no matter how elaborate their social diversions may be, it will be a long time before they strike the giddy pace set by Mrs. Smith Hollis McKim. Mrs. McKim was the life of the Reno divorce colony and when she left her departure was mourned by everybody. To celebrate her freedom she gave a great party the night before she shook the dust of the desert from her trim boots. The scene of this festivity was Thomas' restaurant, across the street from the Golden Hotel. Everybody who was anybody in Reno's permanent society or in Reno's divorce colony, was invited to the celebration; and not a single invited guest ignored the invitation. There was music, there was dancing, there was laughter, there was plenty to eat and there was a superabundance of champagne. When mine host Thomas presented his bill at the conclusion of the merry affair, it totalled an imposing figure. Mrs. McKim's going-away party cost her seventeen hundred dollars, to say nothing of gratuities.

The Cavalier Servente in Reno

Reno society has been transformed since the divorce colony settled there. Before the present glorious epoch started, Reno's society was crude. Nowadays it resembles the society of London, Paris and New York in one important particular. I refer to Reno's acquisition of the cavalier servente. Those who know their Byron will remember that the naughty poet explained this peculiar institution in his tale of "Beppo." The cavalier servente flourishes in society wherever husbands are tiresome to their volatile spouses and where spouses have no husbands, as in Reno, the cavalier servente is indispensable. He does the thousand and one things which a husband should do, but so frequently neglects. He is accorded a measure of freedom which shocks the staid, thereby adding zest to the life of the fair lady to whom he is carpet knight. In Reno he is a recognized institution, scandalous but indifferent to scandal. Because Reno has no gilded youth, no leisure class, the Reno cavalier servente is usually an impecunious clerk of good looks and tolerable manners. The Renowidow breakfasts with him publicly at any time from eleven to two and has him to dinner between six and nine. As he spends more money for these meals than he makes in a week, it is evident that he is not entirely dependent upon his salary. But as he is the soul of discretion nobody ever learns what his source of income is. It is very interesting, is it not?

Five Josselyns Received

The most notable thing about the Josselyn ball Wednesday night was the presence of the five daughters of the family in the receiving party. Myra, the debutante, was supported by no less than nine relatives including her parents, sisters and three brothers-in-law. She is a pretty Titian-haired girl like her sisters Margery and Gertrude who is Mrs. Gerald Rathbone. The other two, Mrs. McDonald Spenser and Mrs. Ettore Avenalli, are pronounced blondes. Many people consider Mrs. Avenalli the beauty of this family, although Mrs. Rathbone has learned to dress her peculiar type to bring out her best points. She has been wearing odd shades of blue very effectively. Mrs. Spenser is undoubtedly the cleverest. She has marked talent as a comedienne. The Josselyns live in the country at Woodside the year round but there was a gathering of the tribe during the week at the Fairmont, for the ball. The Avenallis came from San Jose, the Spensers from Menlo Park and the Rathbones from Burlingame. Mr. Josselyn, who prefers writing books or reading about Napoleon to any other diversion, looked bored, but the ball was a brilliant success and the last of the Josselyn girls is fairly launched.

Bride May Occupy Tevis House

The news that Mr. and Mrs. Will Tevis are to build a new home on their Bakersfield estate, holds an interesting detail. It is said that the present residence is to be moved to another part of the ranch where it will eventually be occupied as a home by one of the Tevis boys. This revives the rumor that in spite of their extreme youth the oldest son of the household and the pretty girl he spent much time with in Santa Barbara last summer are provisionally engaged. They are too young to be formally betrothed but another season may see an announcement. The Tevis family spend most of their time at Bakersfield where they have a great many guests although the present residence is not large, having only three guest chambers. It is a costly structure of concrete surrounded by a garden that has no counterpart in California except at the Harry Tevis place near Los Gatos. Near the house is a swimming pool hidden in a grove of bamboo that is one of the most beautiful and picturesque spots in the park. The new house which will be a veritable mansion will occupy the site of the present residence and work will be begun on it the first of the year.

Prince D'Abro Goes

Prince D'Abro departed for Europe a few days ago as unostentatiously as he came. He spent two months in San Francisco without creating any undue excitement in society and without being captured with his title by a local belle. The Prince was much sought after the Crocker introduced him, but while he admired the beauty of eligible girls he evidenced a decided preference for the society of matrons. The fact is he is not a fortune hunter and American millions have no charm for him. He enjoys a princely revenue from estates in Egypt inherited from his grandfather who was prime minister to a past Khedive. Although he lives in Paris most of the time Prince D'Abro is an Armenian. He visited at Burlingame where Dick Tobin entertained him several times.

The Barron Ball

The Barron ball has been added to the list of private soirees for the season. It will be given at the Fairmont on December 31 and will be a brilliant ending for the year. The date selected is an auspicious one and gives latitude for much merriment attendant upon the debut of the younger daughter of the household. The new year will be appropriately welcomed and there are said to be interesting surprises in store for the guests. Mrs. Barron always entertains on a lavish scale. When Marguerite Barron made her debut at a ball given in the old Palace a cotillon was danced for which favors were especially imported from Paris. Among them were some exquisitely painted French fans. Both the Barron girls spent several years abroad and speak French and Italian fluently.

The O'Connors Here in Force

The O'Connors have converged from several quarters of the world until there are now five of them in San Francisco with only two, Ella and Belle, left in Europe. The genial William has now four of his six sisters about him for the first time in a number of years. Maud, Lily and Celia O'Connor were recently joined by Cornelia who has been living in Italy with the two remaining abroad. With one of them Billy has taken an apartment to try housekeeping after a long residence at the St. Francis. Mrs. Lily O'Connor continues to live at the Fairmont and Misses Maud and Celia are at the Victoria.

"Billy" Hopkins Married Again

I hear that William F. Hopkins has married again and that his third wife, like his first, is a trained nurse. The ceremony was performed, it seems, in Lake County where the romance had its inception, and was so quietly performed that it was some few days before "Billy's" mother learned of his bliss. "Billy's" mother is the widow of Orrin K. Hopkins who was a brother of E. H. Hopkins, the father of Mrs. Will and Mrs. Gus Taylor and Mrs. Fred McNear. The money of the family came from old Mark Hopkins. When Orrin Hopkins died he left a lot of valuable real estate, including the St. Anne building which stood at the corner of Powell and Geary streets before all our old landmarks were burned away. "Billy" belongs to a branch of the Hopkins family which has never been much impressed with the importance of society as a career and seems to be addicted to unexpected marriages. In the haste of his nuptials he is not unlike his sister, Mabel Hopkins who gave the town a sensation a few years ago by her sudden marriage to Charley Quinn, the well known turfman. Mrs. Quinn had every opportunity to cultivate the exclusives among whom her cousins have their being, but she rejected the open arms of society and appears to have been quite happy in spite of her renunciation.

Arthur Inkersley to Marry

Arthur Inkersley of Lyme Regis, Dorsetshire, England, and for more than twenty years a well-known contributor to local periodicals, is enjoying a delightful visit in Paris. He will shortly marry Mrs. Fearn, the widow of the Hon. Walker Fearn, United States Minister to Roumania and Greece, and a member of the International Court of Egypt. The marriage will take place in Europe, probably before the end of the year. Mrs. Fearn is the daughter of a rich sugar planter of Louisiana. She is known for her benevolent work on behalf of the blind in which she acted as personal representative of "Carmen Sylva" (Queen Elizabeth of Roumania). During her stay in Europe she has become well acquainted with the leading royal personages. At present Mrs. Fearn and her fiance are the guests of Mrs. Fearn's daughter, Mrs. Barton French of New York and Hot Springs, Va., in her Paris apartment in the Rue Benjamin Godard. After the wedding they will probably visit London before taking up their residence on the Riviera. Mrs. Fearn is a woman of great personal attractions and charm of manner; she also possesses strong literary and dramatic talents.

A Best Exhibition

The canvasses that Mr. A. W. and Alice Best have put on exhibition this week in the blue room of the St. Francis are of a character that should interest all lovers of art. This is the first exhibition held by the Bests outside their own studio. They have been making wonderful progress, and their paintings are growing steadily in demand among people with taste for the silent poetry of the brush. Mr. Best has talent for placing on canvas light and sunshine and beautiful color, and Mrs. Best is noted for her dainty figures. There are many new and striking pictures in the exhibition, and also some illustrations, sketches and posters done by students of the Best studio.

In the Social Spotlight

The place was aglow with enthusiasm oality. Yet the welcome that Tetrazzini received, though a joyous one, was far from tumultuous. The enthusiasm of the audience was more than a relaxation from gravity, but there was no display of frenzy such as distinguishes great public demonstrations of feeling. I have read that the hall rocked with applause and rang with "bravas!" but I was never sensible of such boisterous testimony of high feeling. This is the day of superlatives. Everything unusual is described as unprecedented; everything exceptional as marvelous. Epochs and epics are born while you wait. And so we must make allowance for exaggeration even in newspaper accounts of the welcoming of an adored singer. In venturing to question the unanimous dictum of my contemporaries I must expect to be told that I am impudent, or affected, or even that I have an incurable grouch; but I must confess nevertheless that the behaviour of the Dreamland audience was a trifle too decorous to suit me. I love to be carried off my feet with the contagion of enthusiasm. Monday night I thought of the Patti nights in Mission street when corsage bouquets were flung upon the stage, and men danced like dervishes in the aisles, and glad emotion was dissolved in tears. To tell all I thought would be to make this report of the concert seem like the lamentation of old people for the summers of their early years. Suffice it that the audience (with the exception of a score or so of Italians in one section) did not rise to the occasion. It was never for a moment delirious. Its pent-up emotions never broke loose. And this I attribute to the fact that the audience was spread out over a great space in such manner that there was little facility for infection of feeling. Most certainly it was not due to any lack of magnetism in Tetrazzini. For that mysterious quality she radiated from the moment that she burst upon the view like some new bird of Paradise, so plump, so richly nourished, as to justify the suspicion that she has sampled generously her own recipes, and as colorful as a whole staff of gov-ernatorial colonels. Bubbling over with amiability, apparently in the finest fettle, on the moment of her appearance she warmed her audience with her beaming countenance, as a moment later with her soulful voice she kindled rapture in the coldest heart. And what a glorious treat she gave that audience as she poured out her flood of song seemingly with as much pleasure to herself as to others! As she sweeps that sensitive instrument, the human heart, invoking its varied tones, she has the air of one listening in rapture to the silver sounds, drawing them in as one draws perfume from a flower. Of that voice and the effects that are achieved with it there is nothing to be sincerely said in the nature of criticism. Phrases descriptive of Tetrazzini's singing have come to mean less and less as they grow worn out with use, and so there is little left for the critic to do but pile epithet on epithet to give animation to mere rhetoric. When it is said that Tetrazzini is mistress of the technic of her art, and that her excellence lies in sweetness of tones and simplicity, ease and sureness of execution there is but little more to be added. Monday night she exhibited to us her whole equipment of gems, her brilliant staccati, her wonderful arpeggi, the dazzling facility of her chromatic runs; and after electrifying the audience with her glorious colorature she gave them a beautiful contrast, a lovely legato of Mozart's to which only the very greatest artists can do justice. As she sang this aria, the notes falling from her lips "like languid drops from the bending flower" through every pulse the music stole with all the sweetness of a mountain meadow's softest sigh. This is the impression that I carried away from Dreamland Rink, and I have it with me yet.

the globules of grief coursing down his and pattering on his program is anything elime. So of course we determined that would try our hardest to restrain our tears.

Realizing that we were far from callous, knowing as a matter of fact that we possessed hearts full of beautiful sympathy that had never heard a tale of sorrow without melting into some good action, appreciating in fine what splendid fellows we were, we felt that it would be no easy task to mantle our visages with dissimulation during the agonizing scenes of "Madame X." Still, at the risk of being accounted hard-hearted brutes, we resolved to try. It was because I could not foresee the outcome of the attempt that I was nervous as the play began. Well! I might have saved myself the trouble. I found that "Madame X" was a cracking good melodrama but not a tearcompeller. Not once was I in danger of spilling a lachrymose tribute to its pathos. There was no moisture in my enjoyment, no furtive drop to mar my vision. Not once did I have to cough the embarrassed cough that stays the rising flood.
My feelings were harassed but unliquefied. The absence of dampness, however, did not detract from my enjoyment of the play. The shedding of tears I do not include in my list of diversions and if I had yielded a few trickles to the appeal of "Madame X" I should have gone away with the conviction that I was maudlin. I thoroughly enjoyed "Madame X," as in times past I have thoroughly enjoyed "East Lynne" and "Hazel Kirk" and "The Two Orphans" and "The Lights o' London," without making an intermittent fountain of my eyes. Like all the melodramas which I have mentioned "Madame X" tells a sad and interesting story, but I don't see why any but the most melting sentimentalists should cry over it. I don't suppose they do. When it reaches the stock stage only very impressionable high school girls will weep. The tears will flow at matinees only. That "Madame X" will prove a valuable addition to the repertoire of stock companies I make no doubt. It has four picturesque scenes full of action, plenty of characters, all painted with broad strokes in vivid colors, and its theme is one which should appeal to the next generation as much as to this. It is not as good a play as "The Two Orphans," but it is equal to the other melodramas which I have mentioned, and that is saying a great deal. It is by no means a hard play to act, but this is no reflection on Miss Dunlap and the rest of the company who act it very well indeed.

Stage

The Artistic de Gogorza

Our two impresarios—Greenbaum and Leahy—are providing music lovers with an abundance of entertainment this week. It was of course not with deliberation that they brought Tetrzzini and de Gogorza to the city in the same week, but so great is the passion for song hereabouts that both artists are meeting with success from the pecuniary standpoint. The Columbia Theater was crowded last Sunday afternoon on the occasion of de Gogorza's concert, and the distinguished Spanish baritone compelled the warm and enthusiastic appreciation of his perfect art. Few singers have so many admirers in San Francisco as de Gogorza. And few there are deserving of the esteem in which he is held, for he is capable not only of giving delight but instruction also. His singing is always an object lesson in the art of song. He sings with exquisite taste, and always in perfect sympathy with the theme. His program last Sunday was one of considerable novelty including as it did a group of songs by Cesti of a most captivating quality, which de Gogorza rendered most effectively. It was a varied program, too, abounding in good things. There were songs from Tschaikowsky, Brahms, Koechlin and Faure, songs of the most classic quality, songs of rare delicacy and great daintiness, and all the varied beauties of them were brought out with rare artistry that stirred the audience to rapturous applause. De Gogorza will be heard again at the Columbia Theater this Sunday afternoon.

Be sure there's a box of Geo. Haas & Sons' candies included with the rest of the good cheer. The same variety of candies in each store. Four conveniently located stores: Phelan Building, Fillmore at Ellis, Van Ness at Sutter and 28 Market St., near Ferry.

"St. Elmo" at the Alcazar

An elaborate revival of "St. Elmo," the dramatic sensation of last year, will be the Alcazar's next attraction, commencing Monday night. Charles E. Gunn will have the title part in which he toured the Pacific Coast with a company directed by Frederic Belasco, and Elizabeth Stewart is cast for the role of Edna Earl. Most of the other characters will be impersonated by the people who had them when the play scored a three weeks' run in the Sutter-street theater a twelvemonth ago.

Tetrzzini Concert

Tetrzzini will sing at Dreamland this Saturday afternoon, December 17, at half past two, offering a program which will include the aria "Ah fors e lui" from "La Traviata," "Bel Ragio" from "Semiramide" and "Polacca" from "Mignon." The third concert with still a different program will be given next Tuesday night, December 20. On account of the enormous demand for matinee tickets a special and farewell concert has been arranged for Monday afternoon, December 26, which is a legal holiday. A special program will be prepared and the seats will be ready at Sherman, Clay & Co's next Monday morning. Mail orders must be accompanied by check or money order and if the ticket be returned by mail an addressed and envelope must be enclosed. Oakland is to have an additional concert for the house city was sold out within an hour of the sale. Tetrzzini will therefore appear at Ye Liberty Playhouse next Thursday, December 22, in an entirely different program. For this event seats will be on sale at Ye next Monday morning and mail orders addressed to H. W. Bishop.

Another Week of Polly

"Polly of the Circus" with its saw-dust pretty love story and many interesting episodes is once more a popular attraction here. Engagement at the Columbia runs through next week with matinees on Wednesday and Saturday. The Margaret Mayo play has at the hands of Frederic Thompson a cast, spectacular stage setting and a fine production. There will be a performance on Sunday and on Monday. "Polly of the Circus" begins its second and final week.

Charles Frohman's great musical at the Columbia on the night of Monday, December 24, will be the first presentation here of the national success

The decorations for the coming week is very large and life to say that "Madame X" will leave the Savoy with a record for attendance that will be remembered. Sunday evening, December 25, Jefferson De Angelis will begin an engagement limited to eight nights at the Savoy Theater in De Koven and Herbert's music opera, "The Beauty Spot."

Edwin Arden at the Orpheum

Edwin Arden, the popular young star, comes to the Orpheum next week with a romantic one-act drama named "Captain Velvet," which he has written for himself. Mr. Arden will be remembered in this city for his clever work in "The Morals of Marcus" in which he shared the honors with Marie Doro two seasons ago. Alexander and Scott, last season the most important feature of Cohan and Harris's Honey Boy Minstrels, are back in vaudeville and will present a new skit called "From Old Virginia." Joe Jackson, styled "The European Vagabond," will introduce his humorous performance. "A Night in a Monkey Music Hall" which will be presented by Maud Rochez will be remembered as one of the cleverest and most amusing animal acts that have ever been presented on the Orpheum Circuit. Next week closes the engagement of Marvelous Griffith, Hilda Thomas and Lou Hall, Stanley and Norton, and Hymack, the chameleon comedian.

"The Lost Trail"

Next Monday evening Manager Harry Bishop of Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will offer his patrons "The Lost Trail," a play of Western army life that will be entirely new to theatergoers around the bay. Although it has not been seen in California before, this piece has been extensively played throughout the East, both by traveling companies and in stock, and has always proved a most popular attraction. Sydney Ayres and Muriel Hope will have the leading roles. "The Dollar Mark" will receive its Oakland premier at Ye Liberty on Christmas Day (Monday) matinee.

The Distinction of Red Hair

Red hair is no disgrace—no, indeed, it's a distinction. Anybody can have black hair, and some people manage to get along with a little sprinkling of flaxen mane. But it takes a boy or girl out of the ordinary to wear a deep red shade and live up to it. There is not a great variety of shades in red hair. It does not run from pink to crimson, and contains no greens nor mauves. Red is red, unless the girl has a lot of money, and then, of course, it is auburn. But red hair has come into its own. Henner has made it famous in his pictures. Titian appreciated it hundreds of years ago, and today the world takes notice of the red-headed people, from Mrs. Leslie Carter to the new sultan of Turkey. Judge Kyle of Kansas City dismissed a red-headed prisoner, telling him, "Your red hair is your salvation." In three years he has had only six red-headed men before him, and not one was found guilty. Red hair usually goes with a bright mind and a vivacious temperament. They used to tell us that it also indicated a fiery temper, but we leave that for the men with red-headed wives to determine. Wasn't Helen of Troy red headed? You can trust red-headed persons—you can trust them to do as they please. They are rather warm to have around in summer, and there are those who do not appreciate their peculiar style of beauty. But the red-headed girl is a winner—and the man who gets one will not be lonesome. He will soon find out whether he has drawn a Titian haired angel or a combination of a cyclone and a sunset.

"How do you like this oatmeal soap?" inquired the barber. "Seems nourishing," replied the customer, "but I've had my breakfast."

The Rest was Silence

"Why do they say, 'As smart as a steel trap'?" asked the talkative boarder. "I never could see anything particularly intellectual about a steel trap."

"A steel trap is called smart," explained the elderly person, in his sweetest voice, "because it knows exactly the right time to shut up."

More might have been said, but in the circumstances it would have seemed unfitting.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Early in the week rumors of a cut in finished steel products caused heavy liquidation in steel which carried this stock down below its recent low point and started liquidation in the general list. Later in the week the steel corporation issued its November tonnage statement, showing a decrease of 111,000 tons. While this is apparently a low record, it is not so in reality, owing to a change of method in computing. On the present basis the unfilled orders as of September 30, 1904, would be the actual low record. Among steel authorities it is thought that the low has been reached and they look for a gradual improvement with no cut in finished steel. The trade took kindly to this report and a general covering of shorts was in order with the market recovering all of its loss. The New York Central announcement that they had placed orders for 150,000 tons of steel rails is expected to be followed by other roads. Even the most chronic bears concede that the market is in a position for improvement. The bank statement showed quite a loss in cash but this was expected and was not a market factor. Taken all in all we would rather buy the market leaders for the time being and on soft spots, and of these we would strongly advise Reading and the anthracite coalers which in our opinion will show the way in the line for betterment.

Cotton—The principal market factor in cotton during the past week was the Government figures, estimating the total crop at 11,426,000 bales. Prior to this report the market was featureless and trade limited to the local professionals. The report, while just about what was expected, caught the local professionals short the market and the bull leaders took advantage of the condition of the market and in competing with them for cotton forced the price up nearly $4 a bale in a few minutes. The market, however, did not hold the advance but for the balance of the day was wild with fluctuations from 5 to 10 points apart. Liverpool did not get excited over the report and sent lower quotations which seemed to give the bears courage and they put out some of their lines again. The week-end figures were in favor of the bulls as they showed that spinners were in the market for cotton at this level and had taken more cotton up to this time this year than last year. However, stocks of cotton at all points are much larger than last year. There seems to be quite a difference of opinion in regard to the next move marketwise. The bulls are talking much higher prices and say that the Government's estimate, while low, is not low enough and that the final ginning will show a crop not over 11,000,000 bales. The bears are equally confident of getting lower prices and say the Government figures based on previous ginning are too low. They also point to the price which looks high when the condition of trade throughout the country is taken into consideration. In the meantime we expect a traders' market with fluctuations within a range of about 50 points based upon actual supply and demand for the raw material or until such a time as the trade can get a better idea as to the actual crop.

Wheat—Official announcement of the initial acreage and condition of the wheat seeded for the crop of 1911 has taken off none of the burden of the crop of 1910. The latter is crowding the capacity of the warehouses beyond the Atlantic, to say nothing of the fact that two exporting countries, Argentine and Australia, are within a very few weeks of adding to the burdens by heavy new crop shipments. The domestic supply is only a little less in evidence for oppressiveness than is the European. The trade is unable to point to a position, whether it be in the visible supply, in the interior or mill elevators or in farmers' hands, where there is not at least a full normal supply of wheat. In most of these positions the supply is more than ample, as is ably attested by the carrying charges current and the difficulty in keeping the load adjusted to the ever shifting backs of those who are expected to carry it.

Corn—The trade is now confronting the movement in volume of the new crop corn, just as it seasonably confronted the oats and wheat movement a few months before. As in other grains, the seller is facing a buyer made stubborn and rebellious because of the high price exactions of recent years. In corn too the ranks of the buyers have been depleted greatly by the same conditions that have made other buyers stubborn and deliberate. There has been considerable speculative short interest in December delivery.

The Emperor, Heliogabalus

ident signs of enjoyment as you endeavored to asticate the representation; he would seat you air cushions, and have them deflated surreptitiously, thoroughly enjoying your discomfort; it when that was over you would be served with mels' heels, platters of nightingales' tongues, trich brains (600 at a time) prepared with that arum sauce which the Sybarites invented, and which the secret is lost. Therewith were peas d grains of gold, beans and amber, quail powdered with pearl dust, lentils and rubies, spiders ewed in jelly. The guests whom wine overcame ere carried to bedrooms. When they awoke, ere, staring at them, were tigers and leopards—

We are told that the blatant discussions of his amusements made right-minded men blush, causing ultimate nausea for his tastes and opinions. It could only have been the few he had the opportunity of disgusting; the majority had heard the same before, and showed no desire to be shocked. Other Emperors had been as outspoken, be it said to their reprobation, as well as to his, but other emperors had not been so good-hearted, so filled with the charity that thinketh no wrong. When they had scented opposition they removed the cause forthwith;—Elagabalus let it grow and strengthen till it swallowed him up.

In the epitome of the qualities demanded of men, we see the true grounds on which the world has instinctively condemned Elagabalus, though ame, of course—but some of the guests were stupid enough not to know it, and died of fright. It might not be pleasant to be promised adorable firens, and find oneself shut up for the night with an elderly Ethiopian, but it was not essentially cruel or debased—at least, not from the humorist's point of view, as the laughter of the Emperor proved, at the sight of your disgusted face when he let you out in the morning. Unless you were fond of the water it could not have been a pleasant experience to take the part of a water xion (tied to a revolving wheel) for the Emperor's lust of the eye, but if you submitted to these things you were sure of a reward, more liberal than any you had expected. Lampridius reports that no guest left the Emperor's presence with empty hands. After dinner he would give you the gold and silver plate from which you had eaten, or cause you to draw lots for prizes which varied from a dead dog to the half of his daily revenue. He saw no virtue in sending men away in the style of Domitian, with their heads under their arms.

In a discussion on his psychology mention must be made of Elagabalus' love of color. To the Roman white in its cleanliness and simplicity was the acme of an aesthetic taste, though the profusion of purple borderings, the mingling of scarlet and gold, showed his kinship with the children of the south. Syria, and the East generally, loved that mass of brilliancy which relieves the aridity of the land. Elagabalus, posing as the aesthete of his time, annoyed the Roman world by his love of purple and shaded silk garments, by his passion for green in all its known shades, and for feasts in which everything was in the deep azure of a cloudless sky. Today we still cultivate color schemes—and without much hostile comment, as it takes the philosopher to discover their puerility, the prurient-minded their wickedness and degeneracy.

probably without quite knowing why they did so. He possessed the virtues along with the mind of a woman, and a voluptuous woman at that, but had little of what the world expects to find in the male animal. His reign was short, so he left no traces of his mind on the Empire, and what little he did effect was reversed by his successor. His reign of prodigal extravagance caused not one single new impost; his government of the city and province alike was one of peace and harmony. That infamous system of informers under which the aristocracy and plutocracy of Rome had suffered so direly up to the death of Caracalla was never established by Elagabalus. It may be said that the aristocracy was dead; in fact, it had died twice, at Pharsalia and Philippi; but there were still men whom Domitian and Septimius could attack. For years not a Roman of note had died in his bed, not one but kept a slave who should kill him when his hour was come. All that was a bygone terror under Elagabalus. The people was sovereign, and it was important that that sovereign should be amused, flattered too, and fed. All was done that had been done before by the demi-gods, and all was done with an exaggeration unparalleled. His games in the circus were such that even Lampridius admits that the people considered him a worthy Emperor, because he was endowed with a sense of the grandeur of the Imperial position, and expressed it by his marvellous prodigalities. They made him what he was and has since remained in history—the Emperor of extravagance. In him the glow of the purple reached its apogee. Rome had been watching a crescendo that had mounted with the years. Its culmination was in this hermaphrodite, but the tension had been too great—something snapped; and there was only a procession of bandits—Thracians, Gauls, Dalmatians, and Goths—with Attila for a climax—for the refurbishing of the world.

the passing hearses now creaked over the new fallen snow and when the sun gradually disappeared behind the western clouds, gleams of fire from its receding rays suffused with glowing colors the cold white headstones and the snow covered graves. The old woman in her red mantle, leaning motionless against the grating, appeared for the moment as a huge ball of gold against the snow-strewn black of the churchyard gate.

On one cold night, the old woman placed her tin kettle, filled with coffee on the basin of live charcoal at her side. She sat in the approaching gloom of the winter's night, a lonely figure, and warmed her stomach now and then with a sip of the hot fluid. The pathos of her complete isolation from ties of kin or friendship—from even the thoughts of her fellow creatures—and her absolute insensibility to the forlornness of her condition would appeal most potently to the most callous of hearts. The moon, in cold serenity, appeared in the heavens; one after another the stars peeped out; from a distance came the cheerful sound of sleigh bells and the mournful one of the whinny of horses. Pedestrians jostled one another in their haste to get out of the cold and to reach their respective destinations where warmth and a welcome awaited them.

The old woman rose and attempted to exercise her cold, stiffened limbs, looking eagerly down the road. No, he was nowhere to be seen. Shaking her head, she sat down and drank some more coffee. Evidently it did not taste so good as usual, for she began to scold. "The little imp! May the Old Harry take him!" she growled. "What was he about anyway, meandering around in the snow at this hour? Of what use are children, anyway? Only a source of trouble and anxiety! They should come into the world grown up!"

Having relieved herself by this apostrophe she rose again and peered into the distance. Yes, there he was! She recognized from afar the little bow-legged form bent under the weight of the kettle of refuse. She quickly resumed her seat and as he approached: "If I were not too lazy to get up, I'd make those crooked legs get a better move on!" This without deigning even a glance in the direction of the boy.

He seemed, however, disinclined for the usual evening conversation. Shaking with cold he passed her silently and, climbing up the steps, attempted to enter the house. The door was locked. He set the pail down, laid the hook beside it and stood—poor little chap!—gazing forlornly about, not knowing what to do.

"He can't get in," the old woman whimpered, seeing his predicament. True enough, the people of the house had locked up and gone to a wedding. Of course, nobody thought of the little fellow.

Suddenly the child headed directly for the old woman, holding out his little blue frozen fingers and howling lustily.

"Serves you right!" said that consoling damsel. "I suppose you think that now you will get that apple. Well, you won't; ears boxed, yes, but no apple."

At the same time she put the coffee pail on his mouth and he drank greedily, showing remarkable powers of suction and gazing in manifest trepidation at the old woman who continued giving voice to pleasantries.

Suddenly—she herself could not have told how it happened—she had the half frozen boy in her lap, drew her wide mantle closely about his little form and held him tightly to her breast, never ceasing, however, to scold fiercely! Soon she heard the deep regular breathing of the child and she knew that he slept. She was, therefore, silent and remained motionless.

On the breast of this eighty-year-old woman no human being had been sheltered. Nor love, nor charity, nor compassion had opened those stiffened arms. For she had ever grumbled, had ever thought only of self-gain. Early in life the conviction, never changed, had indelibly imprinted itself alike on heart and mind that humanity and self-interest had naught in common. And now the old woman felt her whole being pervaded by the glow of a sudden exaltation. The unfortunate young life—the first pressed to her barren bosom—inspired within her strange emotions. The withered, rapacious face of the old hag became almost sublime in its expression. The magic touch of mother-love had, for the moment, transformed it.

She listened intently to the breathing of the sleeping child, whose head nestled confidently under her chin. She began to rock gently to and fro. A song came to her memory—one she had learned at school—and she sang it softly, tunelessly, in quaking tones.

When the lamp cleaner came home later she called to him sharply: "Here, take your boy! It's the last time I'll take care of him—mind that!"

"Thank me!" she demanded as she laid the sleeping child in his arms.

An hour later she strapped her baskets together and trudged home as usual.

The next morning the little man emerged from the house, to attend his business. Meeting the glance of the old woman opposite, he stood stock still; then sat down on the stoop and gazed earnestly at her, as one in puzzled thought. A faint recollection of the coddling he had experienced the foregoing evening came to him. He had never known a mother, this little chap! knew nothing of the loving care of a faithful mother-hand, the tender solicitude of a faithful mother-heart. Had he gained his first intimation of mother love at the old woman's breast?

Suddenly he stood in his old place before the basket of red-cheeked apples. Now, however, he ignored them absolutely and looked straight at the old woman's face and said, this time in true disinterestedness: "Say, you! I'll marry you!"

She had to laugh—the first time she had laughed at the little scamp—and without stopping to consider, she reached him the finest apple the whole basket contained.

It was after all the first, that is to say, the only, marriage offer she had ever received.

G. Bayerline, vice-president and general manager of the Warren Motor Car company who is spending a few days in San Francisco for the purpose of assisting the Western Motor Car company in the disposal of several cars, which their subdealers have failed to take as contracted, has decided, because of the limited time that he can stay here, to offer the machines at dealer's prices. Mr. Bayerline who is recognized as one of the most successful automobile men in the country, will visit other Pacific Coast points before returning to Detroit. He declares Warren-troit prospects exceptionally bright throughout the West.

E. P. Brinegar, president of the Pioneer Automobile Company, has just left for Detroit, Michigan, to attend the meeting of the Chalmers dealers in that city. Besides being a Chalmers dealer, Brinegar is also a large stockholder and a director of the Chalmers Motor Company, in the promotion of which he was one of the leading spirits. While in the East Brinegar will visit all the sections devoted to the manufacture of motor cars with the purpose of lining up the support of the automobile industry still more thoroughly for San Francisco as the place for holding the Panama Pacific Fair.

With only the mere indications of winter and muddy roads yet here the Weinstock-Nichols company are already experiencing difficulty in keeping their supply of Morgan & Wright Nobby Tread tires abreast of demand. Speaking in this connection Tony Nichols, manager of the Weinstock-Nichols tire department and designer of the Nobby Treads, said: "The demand for the Nobby Tread tires is already mounting in much larger proportions than it ever attained before. Even during the summer months the demand for these tires continued on the increase."

M. H. Dana, one of the pioneer motorists of the State, will continue to drive his Chalmers 40 roadster which he purchased early in the season 1909. When solicited by Chalmers agents to purchase a new car he said, "Why should I? My 1909 car is as good today as the day I purchased it. I ran it over 20,000 miles; have made two round trips to Los Angeles, two round trips to Lake Tahoe, and forty-two round trips to Santa Cruz."

Walter B. Fawcett who has just gone to Los Angeles in the interest of the Portola Road Race, is endeavoring to line up a number of the Southern California machines and drivers for the event. Among the drivers whom the Portola committee are anxious to have in the race is Teddy Tetzloff. By winning the Santa Monica race and setting a new American record with his Lozier car this young driver has sprung into immediate national fame.

Among the candidates who took advantage of the motor car for political canvass, previous to the recent election, was M. S. Brown of Goldfield who covered his state in a Model L Pope-Hartford, making in all 2200 miles. Previous to this strenuous service the car had done 33,000 miles, having been in continuous use for the better part of four years.

G. A. Boyer of the Consolidated Motor Car Company has been advised by the Pope-Hartford factory that they are now putting cars on the road en route for San Francisco with all possible dispatch. Thirty-five are due to arrive here before January 1.

A letter from Leroy Davey of Jersey City has just been forwarded to the Haynes Auto Sales Company of San Francisco. It reads in part: "To date I have driven the Haynes five thousand miles and only think of the car as 'Old Faithful.' Although I have kept close watch of all bearings, etc., I have not as yet been able to take up any lost motion on a single one. Outside of a couple of punctures from nails the car today stands just as it was delivered to me, after having been driven over the hardest kinds of roads and hills, and during all kinds of weather."

One of the big considerations in purchasing an automobile is whether or not it is hard on tires. Consequently all manufacturers look with no little interest to the tire record made by their cars. Among the highest class cars which have made enviable tire records are the Loziers. These cars, which come as a usual thing with Diamond equipment, have given such results that the Diamond Rubber Company has just issued a booklet entitled, "Little Voyages of Discovery among Some of the Lozier Owners," in which testimonials of tire service are printed.

Noticeable interest has been created in local automobile circles by the arrival recently of the Hupmobile torpedo runabout and the four passenger touring car. These two types together with the coupe, which has been on the local market several weeks, are this season's additions to the Hupmobile line.

Nietzsche and Women

Nietzsche has little to say of women. He is curiously reticent about them. In his philosophy there is evidently to be no over-woman. He says that it is only to men one should speak of women, and all through his work one finds the under-man, and not the over-man, judging women. "Everything in woman is a riddle," he says. And again: "The true man wants two different things—danger and diversion. He therefore wants a woman as the most dangerous plaything." The best women are a little weary of this point of view. To be a toy or a danger, or both, is growing monotonous. Were woman not a consummate actress, and very kind-hearted, she would have dropped the role long ago. "In the true man," he says, "there is a child hidden: it wants to play. Up, then, ye women, discover, I pray you, the child in man." In his Wagner book, he puts women in a strange category. "In the theater," he declares, "one becomes mob, herd, woman, Pharisee, voting animal, patron, idiot, Wagnerian." "As yet," he says, in Zarathustra, "women are incapable of friendship."

"In a woman's love," Nietzsche says, "there is unfairness and blindness to all she does not love. And even in woman's enlightened love there are still outbreaks and lightings, and night along with the light." In his Wagner essay he declares, "Woman would like to believe that love can do all. It is a superstition peculiar to herself. Alas! he who knows the heart finds out how poor, helpless, pretentious, and liable to error even the best, the deepest love is; how it rather destroys than saves." In the same essay he says, "Man is cowardly before all that is eternally feminine; women know it. In many cases of feminine love (perhaps precisely in the most celebrated cases), love is only a more refined parasitism, a nesting in a strange soul, sometimes even in a strange body. Ah, at what expense always to 'the host!'"

"The Siege of the Seven Suitors"

The combination of whimsicalities which Meredith Nicholson has brought together in "The Siege of the Seven Suitors," would keep an ordinary novelist in material for seven years. The scene is laid for the most part in a country mansion on Long Island, new, and up to date in every particular, the property of a spinster rich enough to afford eccentricities, and independent and original enough, after she reached her sixtieth year, to cut loose from the conventionalities of her caste. The family fortune had been founded on baby buggies, and with a royalty of a dollar on every one manufactured and no perceptible diminution in the baby crop, there was abundant means for carrying out whims. Miss Octavia's only brother, a painter who could not paint, had squandered his share of the fortune and now his two beautiful daughters were fain to look to their aunt for their launching. She, nothing loth, had taken them in hand on condition that the elder Cecilia was to be married off first, and until that was accomplished her father and the younger sister, Hezekiah, so named by the same eccentric aunt, were to keep themselves out of the picture. Another condition, known only to the family, was that Cecilia was to give all her suitors equal opportunities. She was to manifest no preference and to be accessible at all times, but as Miss Octavia had a superstitious regard for the number seven, she was to accept the seventh proposal no matter by whom it was made. The suitors, and there was an abundance of them, literally laid siege to the castle, and as it was part of the contract that none was to receive even an obscure hint as to how the land lay, there was more than the usual jealousy and watchfulness intensified by the introduction of an outsider, Prescott Ames, a young architect whose specialty was the correction of ill-behaved chimneys. His installation at Hopfield drew down the concentrated bitterness of the lovers' trust, which, to insure fair dealing, had pledged themselves to call only all together and each to take no advantage of the others, an agreement which, it goes without saying, was never kept. Likewise it goes without saying that though Cecilia Hollister did her best to keep the letter of her contract with her eccentric relative, there was one of the coterie whom she preferred above not only the rest but above all the world, and it was her dearest hope that he would contrive to make his proposal in the right nick of time. As aids and hindrances to the scheme there is a library chimney of irreproachable manners yet with an uncanny propensity to smoke and misbehave itself at critical times though no fault in its construction can be uncovered, and though the mansion is new there is enough of a substantial disturbance to give color to a ghost-yarn which frightens away every servant on the place. There is a freakish condition, worthy of Aunt Octavia Hollister herself embodied in the contract of sale by which she became the owner of Hopfield, and in the background there is a high-art tea room where the attendants assume names from the pre-raphaelite poets during working hours, attract the attention of guests by quoting poetry to them, and decorate the tea tables with minor poets in high art bindings. And in and about and everywhere there is Hezekiah, as eccentric as her aunt, and as live as a globule of mercury. Keeping as much in the background as is possible for such a bit of quicksilver, it is she who gathers the threads of fate into her hands and by tightening a bit here and loosening there, she prevents catastrophe and guides Cecilia's barque and incidentally her own, into sunny waters. It is only towards the end that one of the seven suitors, a professor of mental philosophy, has studied out the situation and by putting two and two together, has figured up that the fifth proposal to Miss Cecilia Hollister having been made and rejected, if he can urge, push or coax some one into sixth place, coming on the heels of that inevitable rejection, his own success will be assured, and a part of the comedy lies in his well directed but unsuccessful efforts to induce Ames to make the sacrifice. Mr. Nicholson seems to have a fancy for secret staircases and surprising chimneys, as well as for freakish relatives with a propensity for match making. He has perhaps the best sustained sense of humor of any living American writer. There is a subtle, Stocktonian flavor about some of his conceptions, and the oddities and unexpectednesses of his characters are never at variance with his plots. They fit in so perfectly that after one has accepted them they are a matter of course until at the end, and in the retrospect, one sees the little island of whimsicality set down in a sea of commonplaces. The superstition which deters so many elderly folk from building new houses to live in is common enough the world over, yet who but Mr. Nicholson has made use of it in just this way, of concealing a part of an old structure intact in the walls of a new mansion and pretending to himself that the whole structure was only an alteration? There are hundreds of people who are assured of good or ill luck attached to certain numbers, but who before has set any one of them as an arbitrary sign to follow to happiness in matrimony? There have been jokes enough made on the subject of the American household god of pie, but it took a Nicholson to introduce a pie into a legal document. The high-art tea room has risen, flourished and decayed in every city of size in the United States, but the Assolando, with its art nouveau wall papers, its portraits of poets and priestesses, with their Ruskin sandwiches and Paracelsus gingersnaps and its anonymous backer is the first to find its way between book covers. Mr. Nicholson has never made any effort to write the Great American Novel, but he succeeds in writing the kind of novel that a great many Americans enjoy reading in their relaxed hours. Notice to Fat Women

Presumably you know, ladies, that the proper shape nowadays is thin. Curves are passé. You have got to take off your fat. This must be done in one of three ways. By dieting, by exercises, or by means of Marmola Prescription Tablets. The two former will keep you busy for months and punish you pretty severely, the latter will cost you 75 cents at the druggist's. The tablets will not make any alteration in your diet necessary, and yet in all probability, before you have used up one case, you will be losing from 12 to 16 ounces of fat a day. Which method do you like the best?

If you fancy this pleasant method of getting on the fat, see your druggist instantly, or else write the Marmola Co., 1220 Farmer Building, Detroit, Mich., to send you a case by mail. These cases contain so generous a quantity of tablets that the treatment is very economical. It is, also, quite harmless, for the tablets are made exactly in accordance with the famous Marmola Prescription.

The Song of the Three Kings

By Laurence Housman

This is the song of the Kings.
Who watched by the eastern sea:
"Earthward Orion swings;
"When will the warning be?

"The chamfron-bells of our camels
"Are jangled and chimed in stall:
"They chafe at the harness-trammels.
"When will the faring fall?

"God liveth for ever and aye;
"In the night He is very nigh:
"But at daybreak we fast and pray,
"Lest the sign of His Sign pass by."

So each King bowed, and prayed
To know when the Sign should be:
Till the first King lifted his head,
And cried to the rest, "I see!

"I see a Star. It is dim
"With vapour of censers swung
"By shawm-voiced cherubim,
"Palm-waving of wings among.

"The vision, beholden afar
"Of Balaam, Sceptre and Rod.
"The bright and the morning Star:
"The Sign, and behold, 'tis God!"

So the first King mounted in awe,
And hasted to go from thence;
And fair in his train men saw Offering of frankincense.

But the second King had sight
Of a Star on the hills low down
And the rays of its golden light
Rose up like a kingly crown.

And he cried, "Behold a King
"Is coming to rule all lands;
"He shall cover the north with his wing,
"And shadow the south with his hands."

So he mounted in haste, and passed
With a company manifold;
Whose camels, from first unto last,
Went laden with gifts of gold.

But the last King bowed his head,
"Lo, yonder I see arise
"A Star from its sea-worn bed,
"Snow-wan to the withering skies;

"With never a kingly ray,
"And never a censer swung,
"But a beam thrown either way,
"And a beam to the earthward hung.

"And to Earth, with the endless pain
"Of her seas, are the feet of the star;
"And Heaven, with his stores of rain,
"Weeps over the arms stretched far."

So he mounted with beating of bells,
And running and toil of breath:
O, Earth, a token that tells
"Salvation cometh of Death.

"Yet blessed be God for this:"
(He laded his train with myrrh.)
"The wealth of my gift, I wis,
"Shall be for a sepulchre."

Now blessed be the kingly boons
They bring from the eastern sea!
Nigh nine are the Maiden's moons;
Nigh must the bearing be.

Christmas

By Arthur C. Headlam

A little more than nineteen hundred years ago a little child was born. Whatever strange facts may have accompanied his birth, nothing of that was known to his neighbors. He grew up as a village boy in the country districts of Galilee. He was a carpenter, the son of a carpenter. He lived among the people and was held to be like the people, to live as they did, and to think as they did. The times were troubled ones. The old glories of Judaism seemed to have gone—the newer tinselled glory of the Herods was over. The strong might of the Roman legions was breaking the spirit of the people. Everywhere the tax-gatherer was collecting his tribute. Turbulent spirits were striving for revolt; religious dreamers were building up their apocalyptic visions of a kingdom which was to come. Then a voice was heard coming from the desert, with something of the sternness of the old prophetic utterance, saying that the "kingdom" was coming, telling men to give up their sins and to wash them away in the waters of baptism. The carpenter of Nazareth seemed to be seized with the contagious enthusiasm. He listened to the teaching; he was baptised as others; he withdrew into the desert. From the desert he came back and began to teach. Followers collected round him: he stirred up enthusiasm as no man had ever taught before. He healed the sick, he cleansed lepers, he cast out devils. Crowds flocked round him. Surely here was the Messiah! surely the kingdom had come! But the obvious notes of the Messiah were not there. Here was no commander to lead the turbulent spirits against the legions of Rome. Here was no supernatural figure that came down from heaven and appeared amidst the assembled worshippers in the courts of the Temple. They were disappointed. The Scribes and the Pharisees questioned him, and he would tell them nothing that they wanted to know. But a small body of true friends clustered round him. A short period of enthusiasm, a short period of disappointment—and he and his followers went to Jerusalem. He went as the Messiah. Some accepted him as the Messiah. There were hopes that there might now be a revolt. But the wise priests had no intention of embroiling the country with Rome—certainly not for one who seemed to think little of their authority or the authority of the doctors of the Law. The rigorous methods of Roman administration quenched the rising hopes. His disciples forsook him and fled.

A few years, and we find the little band of disciples who seemed to have so little courage—a group of ignorant Galilean peasants—preaching Jesus the Messiah. They are filled with a new and strange spirit. Crowds come to hear them—the message spreads through Palestine—the opposition that it arouses scatters the preachers far and wide. Damascus and Cyprus and Antioch become the centres of the new faith; and under the leadership of the pupil of a well-known Rabbi, who himself had been a persecutor, it makes marvellous steps onward, and in spite of opposition and persecution it spreads throughout the Empire. It rears its head in Rome; everywhere, like a silent leaven, it works through the world. Sometimes opposed, sometimes, perhaps fostered, it seems to be ever growing. It creates a new life, a new hope, and a new enthusiasm. It withstands the cruellest persecutions and conquers the Empire.

And then we hear a knocking at the distant gates of Rome—the sound of new nations rising into being. Wild and fierce and strong barbarians, they sweep over the Alps; they overthrow the great cities; they ravage the provinces. The world seems to have come to an end. But that power seizes them. It captures the conquerors, and by them obtains a new dominion. It rears a great spiritual kingdom stronger than the old temporal kingdom of the Caesars. It builds up a new and strange comity amongst new races. Revolt against the new power arises, as it arose against the old. New nations start into the world to gain a new life, and still inspired by the same faith. And even now, in many new lands, under tropical suns, in the great prairies of America, sometimes in new and strange guises, the old power lives on. In a very different way from his imagining thought, the stone which Daniel the prophet saw in his vision has grown and spread and filled the earth. Whence this power? whence this force? Who was that child, born in that obscure province of the Roman Empire nineteen hundred years ago, whose birth portended such wonderful things to the world? The Christian church takes us to Bethlehem; it shows us the little child lying in a manger; it bids us see the shepherds worshipping; it bids us see that strange caravan that had come from distant Eastern lands; it bids us gaze on that bright glory in the skies; it lets us hear the voice that said to Mary, 'He shall be great and shall be called the Son of the Highest; he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end; that holy thing shall be called the Son of God.' It bids us hear the voice which said to the shepherds, 'For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour which is Christ the Lord,' and to hear the angelic song, 'Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men of goodwill.' What would it teach us by these stories which are woven into the very fabric of Western thought? It tells us that we must see in that peasant teacher the revelation of God in the world. And we, as we ponder over the pageant of Christian history, and think of the message which then came to men, and wonder what power would suffice to accomplish all that has happened, and as we feel in our hearts that peace which Christ alone can give amid the trials and temptations and disappointments of the world, may not we too say, as others have said before us, 'Truly this is the Son of God?'

Some Legends of the Abruzzi

By Edward Hutton

I.

One evening at Greco, because of the noise and heat, I had wandered out towards S. Michele for the sake of the silence and the wind. Greco is a village of some two thousand inhabitants set on the hillside more than three thousand feet above the sea in the midst of the Abruzzi, some twenty miles from Sulmona. The heat was wonderful. It was not heavy as any great heat in other lands is, but vehement and marvellous with all the fierceness and vitality of fire, the pride and beauty of the sun. Slowly, slowly the delicate shadows had crept through the vineyards, the wind had died in the woods, in the hushed fields the corn seemed about to burst into flame. For three days then the Crucifix had been uncovered in Santa Croce and the whole village seemed to be there all day praying for rain; a strange, a marvellous sight. And the days were not more wonderful than the nights. Each day was like a hard bright precious stone, more dazzling and more heartless than a diamond. Everything was still. And the nights were like apophyses. The sun delighted and frightened me: it was wonderful and a little mysterious. When they had uncovered the Crucifix it had been as though some strange Presence had suddenly come into our midst.

As I lay that evening just within the forest not far from a little stream that, in spite of the drought, still ran secretly under the trees, among the stones, out into the parched valley, I heard a clear voice say softly: "Of what is the Signore thinking; it is perhaps of his own country?"

Looking round I saw a pair of eyes staring at me from under a tangle of black hair, and Ulisse came towards me. Ulisse was some fourteen years old and in some sort my servant.

I lay back among the broom and answered, 'Tell me a story then, Ulisse—and I shall forget again.'

"But the Signore has heard all the stories of the Signore Antonio, he has heard all the stories of my mother and my mother's mother—what is here left to tell?"

"Tell me them over again."

"Which of them all will the Signore hear? but indeed he knows them all by heart! There is that one of the birth of Bambino Gesu—yes? And that of the Madonnina when she was a girl at school, and that of Sampietro who was always hungry, even as myself—which of them all shall I tell then?"

And I said, "Tell me the adventures of Madonna."

"Signore, why do you always like that best? For my part I prefer those of Sampietro—how he stole the ham, or how he put the devil's head on the bella ragazza, but . . .

"As the Signore doubtless knows, Erode had ordered the massacre of the Innocenti, for he wished, ah, how indeed he wished! to kill the Bambino Gesu who was a greater king than he. So San Giuseppe and the Madonna had to flee away. Ah, Madonna . . . she carried always in the nest of her arms wrapped in her apron Jesus our Saviour. And as she went, as she went, the Pharisees met her and said, 'Beautiful Lady, what do you carry in your apron?'

"And she answered, 'I carry Il Gran' Signore.' "But the Pharisees mistook her, thinking she said 'Grano, Signori,' and they answered, 'Carry it then to the mill.' So she passed on with our Lord and San Giuseppe.

"And again the Pharisees met them and said, 'Beautiful Lady, what do you carry then in your apron?'

"And she said, smiling perhaps, 'A mass of Flowers.'

"That is not for us,' they said one to another, and went on their way.

"And in truth, Signore, Madonna spoke but truth, for Il Gesu Cristo is indeed a Gran' Signore and also a mass of Flowers. Was it a miracle then that the Pharisees took one for another?"

"And as they went on their way Madonna had compassion on San Giuseppe, for he was tired. But everywhere they met companies of Pharisees and it was necessary to continue on the way, so they left the road for a time and entered into the fields. Signore, it was a field where they were sowing beans . . . and the bean is the spy of the year.* Madonna blessed the field and immediately the beans sprang into blossom, and she went on her way. Then came the Pharisees at the top of the field and asked the contadini, 'Has a woman with a Bambino and an old man passed by?'

"And they answered, 'She has passed by, Sis-signori.'

"When?" demanded the Pharisees.

"When we sowed these beans,' answered the contadini.

"And the Pharisees, seeing the beans in flower, turned back and went by another road.

"But Madonna with our Lord and San Giuseppe went still on their way, and as they came to a field of flax the Pharisees came upon them once again and Madonna said to the flax: 'Flax, O Flax, hide me this Baby.' And the flax hid Him, and the wind passed over the field so that the waving of the flax dazzled the eyes of the Pharisees and they saw nothing. And when the danger was past Madonna said, 'Blessed be the flax. May it be so plentiful that the women shall weary of spinning.'

"San Giuseppe and the Madonna with our Lord in her arms had walked all night, and San Giuseppe, for all he walked so strongly, was almost always a long way behind. Suddenly at dawn Madonna spied not far away even another company of Pharisees, but these, Signore, were on horseback, so that she feared more than before that she would fall into their hands. And she cried, 'Run, Giuseppe, run!' And San Giuseppe, using greatly his staff—that which blossomed, you remember, Signore—soon came up to Madonna, but there were neither houses nor shade, nor even a cave thereabout, only an olive-tree. And already the Pharisees cried out, 'Stop, stop.'

"But Madonna turned to the olive and said, 'Do me the charity then to hide us all three.' And the olive opened its trunk as it were a cottage, Signore, even as they do still, and Madonna with the Bambino and San Giuseppe entered in. Then it closed again. And within there was light, for it was not wanting in oil. But the Pharisees who had seen, a little before, Madonna and our Lord and San Giuseppe, found only the ass grazing hard by; and they could not understand because they were Pharisees. And they sought all night but found nothing. Then, when they were gone, the olive opened and Madonna came forth with her little Son and San Giuseppe. And Madonna said to the olive, 'May thy fruit be blessed.' And that, Signore, is why we say Olio Santo, Holy Oil, and that is why this oil will heal wounds and burns and tumors; is it not so?"

"And so, as the Signore knows, since the Pharisees themselves could not find Madonna, they sent for a brigand. Now, Signore, nothing may escape the watchfulness of a brigand, and it is part of his business to waylay people in his mountains. This brigand then returned to his companions and said to them, 'If a beautiful lady should pass by, take her for me.'

"And the captain of the band heard him, and said, 'She is yonder in the shadow of the mountain, you may take her easily.' And it was as he said.

"And Madonna had not time to hide our Lord or to do anything at all, so they brought her before the captain. 'Beautiful Lady,' he said, 'will you not come and see a bambino of mine, who is covered with sores, for we can find no remedy? Ah, if you might give us some help!'

"And Madonna entered into the cave of the captain of the brigands, and his wife presented to her the little sick one. And does the Signore know what Madonna did? She took off the swaddling clothes of Gesu Cristo, she unwound the bands around about Him, and placing a trough of water close by her she washed Him very well. Then with that water she washed also the bambino of the captain of the robbers. And that baby, Signore, in a second of time was healed. The captain of the robbers wished to cover Bambino Gesu with gold, but the Madonna said 'No.' Then he went with Madonna a good part of the way, always blessing her. And if the Signore will believe me, that one who had wished to take Madonna was the impenitent thief, the other the good thief. Both of them ended their lives on the cross on Calvary, on either side of Jesus our Saviour. But it was the good thief alone who saw Paradise."

II.

The sun had set, the glory that had transfigured the world had departed. Through the immense stillness came faintly the sound of a bell; when

Carnegie's Christmas Gift

Mr. Andrew Carnegie has given the world a most appropriate Christmas gift. He has created a fund for a purpose which we find symbolized in the life of Christ of whom it has been said that in disarming Peter he disarmed every soldier. To put an end to the "splendid murder of war" is to revolutionize the world by persuading the world to live up to the fundamental principle of Christianity, which is the brotherhood of man. The mission of Christ remains unfulfilled while there is not peace on earth. How Mr. Carnegie's fund is to be employed is a matter yet to be determined. There are many problems to be solved before there can be any prospect of the glorious consummation contemplated by the philanthropic millionaire. Through the centuries war has become one of the most inveterate of all the habits of mankind. All history is of nothing but fighting and killing and the honors bestowed on the brilliant butchers of the human family. The love of military glory is one of the most tenacious of the vices of our species, and it will persist so long as mankind shall continue to bestow more liberal applause on their destroyers than on their benefactors. It has been said that war is the business of barbarians, but Christians have practiced it with a great deal of zeal, and never more fiercely than in the name of Christianity. Yet of Christianity has been born the sentiment that war is abhorrent and should forever be discontinued. In the light of Christian civilization we have come to dread the curses and evils and crimes of war, and, better still, we have come to realize that war is an instrument entirely inefficient for redressing wrong. And so, while all the nations of the earth are armed for war, there is not one that would not gladly welcome the prospect of eternal peace.

A Blow at the Solid South

Judging from the sentiment that has been stirred in the South by the appointment of Edward Douglass White of Louisiana as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court President Taft has done much toward solving a problem that has vexed the leaders of his party for many years. With the scratch of his pen President Taft has won for himself the gratitude of the whole South and threatened the Democracy with that greatest of all calamities, the disintegration of its Macedonian phalanx of States. So as a political stroke the promotion of Justice White was one of the finest ever made, and as a supplementary one the appointment of Justice Lamar of Georgia would be hard to beat. But nobody will sincerely conceive the suspicion that President Taft was actuated by political expediency. The naming of Justice White as successor to Chief Justice Fuller, while it came as an overwhelming surprise, is on every hand conceded to be a fit and singularly apt appointment. It was believed that Justice Hughes was slated for the high office, but doubtless as was quite proper President Taft consulted the feelings of the members of the bench and agreed with them that if one of their number was to be honored by promotion it should not be the youngest and least experienced member of the court. The probability is that the appointment of Justice White was in deference to the wishes of his associates, and no better authority could have been consulted in so important a matter.

The Open-Shop Principle

As a result of the taxicab drivers' strike which ended last week the owners of taxicabs are now conducting their business on the open-shop principle. These men are deserving of public applause. By their firmness, their determination not to be intimidated and their resistance of demands they have set an example of inestimable value to all employers of labor in this city. There is nothing that San Francisco so urgently needs as general recognition of the justice of the open-shop principle, which is nothing more than one of the principles of liberty guaranteed by the Constitution. There is no question that more deeply concerns this community than the question which was involved in the taxicab strike. It is really of more importance than the outcome of the contest in Washington between San Francisco and New Orleans. We could well afford to let New Orleans win that contest if the loss would insure us freedom from the tyranny of organized labor.

The Golden Age

Mr. Delos Franklin Wilcox, a student of political science, having attracted some attention to himself by declaring in a lecture that corporations have no rights whatever, the New York Sun wonders what Daniel Webster would have thought of this dictum—"Daniel Webster who had never heard of Delos Wilcox when he argued the Dartmouth College case so eloquently, so plausibly, but, as it now seems, so unsuccessfully." What Daniel Webster would have thought doesn't matter. Daniel Webster lived many years ago, and is therefore behind the times. This is the age of superior intelligence and enlightenment. What lies behind us is not the distance that lends enchantment to the view. We are now living in the only golden age. It is therefore absurd to make invidious comparison of our leaders of thought with their comparatively benighted predecessors.

What Daniel Webster would have thought of Delos Wilcox is perhaps about the same as what Alexander Hamilton or Edmund Burke would have thought of Theodore Roosevelt. Were Hamilton and Burke living today they would be regarded as old fogies. There is no longer any reverence for the distinguished philosophers of the centuries ago. We appreciate whatever service they rendered to science, but in the matter of philosophic speculation we much prefer the young scholar fresh from college who tells us what the religion of the future is to be and enlightens us as to the true nature of man. The other day Thomas Edison, a celebrated inventor of mechanical devices, announced that the theory of the immortality of the soul was all nonsense. Now we know what Aristotle, Socrates, Cicero, Lord Bacon, Milton, Shakespeare and innumerable theologians would think of Mr. Edison, but who cares?

Sensational But Not New

According to the despatches from Washington Secretary of War Dickinson has made so sensational a report on the weaknesses of the coast defenses that the Administration has refused to give it to the newspapers. We are told that the report deals chiefly with our unpreparedness for attack from Japan. Why there should be any secrecy on this subject it would be hard to conjecture. Everybody who takes any interest whatever in the subject knows that this country is not prepared for war with Japan. Four months ago Major-General Barry, Commander of the Department of California devoted considerable attention in his annual report to the inadequacy of our coast defense, and the report was made public. He called attention especially to military conditions in the Hawaiian Islands which aside from their intrinsic value to this country would be of the very greatest strategic importance in the event of a war with Japan. He pointed out that by reason of their value to our navy in time of war, not only as a harbor of refuge and base of supply but also as a most effective base for offensive operations they should be properly fortified and garrisoned. He recommended that the islands be made a district of the California department; that the three coast forts, Kamehameha, Ruger and De Russy be garrisoned by eight coast artillery companies; that Fort Shafter be expanded into a regimental post and that at Schofield barracks an entire regiment of cavalry be stationed. Nothing has yet been done toward carrying out General Barry's recommendations, and therefore knowledge of our weakness in the Pacific is not to be hidden by keeping secret the report of the Secretary of War.

The Opium Habit

The news that the authorities have decided to stamp out the drug traffic, close the opium dens and break up the smuggling ring would be gratifying were it not for the improbability of their accomplishing their purpose. The authorities have so repeatedly devoted themselves to this task

Without success that we have little hope of their varying the monotony of defeat. "Hitting the pipe" has been one of the pastimes of victims of the opium habit in this cosmopolitan city for more than a quarter of a century. And during that period we have been hardly ever without an opium smuggling ring. Public sentiment has been frequently aroused against the degrading Oriental vice, and there was a time when opium dens were raided every week, but the traffic in opium has never been extinguished. Singularly enough most of our victims of the opium habit became such with the connivance of the authorities, our jails and penitentiaries being the schools in which they were educated in the delights and mysteries of the vice that has enslaved them. This is a circumstance that should point the way to the authorities in their crusade against the opium habit. To stamp out that habit they must first break up the traffic in opium behind prison walls. They will find it much easier to handle the problem under their own noses than elsewhere.

A Philosophy of Love

The unwholesome effect of a little learning is exemplified in the trial of Dr. Burke of Santa Rosa for attempting to murder Lu Etta Smith. Here we have two persons of small mental calibre who have been groping in the dim light of the region of what is called higher thought and adapting to their own inclinations the metaphysics of philosophers whom they are incapable of understanding. The result is a practical application of a philosophy of love that takes us back to Judah Leo of the Sixteenth century, a curious compound of astrology, theology, mythology and mysticism. Judah Leo was the first philosopher to identify cosmic attraction with love. According to him there are three kinds of love, natural, sensible and rational. By natural love he means those sympathies which attract a stone to the earth, which make rivers flow to the sea and keep sun, moon and stars in their courses. What he regards as sensible love is the love of animals, as natural love that of man. If we study the correspondence of Dr. Burke and Lu Etta Smith we shall see that it is grounded in the panerotic vagaries of Judah Leo, of whom perhaps they have never heard, but with whose teachings they have been made familiar at second or third hand. For many a writer has drawn inspiration from the sixteenth century Italian; no less a philosopher, indeed, than the author of the Anatomy of Melancholy. We can sum up the whole Burke-Smith philosophy of love in the precept that passion is its own law and acknowledges no higher one. This is a convenient precept for any one who wishes to believe with Nietzsche that we have need to transcend morality, or who feels that to lull the languors of infinite ennui one can do no better than imitate the manners of swine.

An Epoch-Making Reform

There is much talk nowadays of the scientific management of railways, but none at all of a matter of much more importance—the scientific management of government. This matter President Taft discussed in his message to Congress, and it is to be hoped that we shall soon begin to give it the consideration that it deserves. Of late we have come to regard statemanship as a science that concerns itself chiefly with sociological problems. The only questions of political economy with which we have occupied ourselves have reference to revenue schemes. So generously have we indulged the passion of our political moralists of the Oyster Bay school for fads and fancies that we have been kept busy devising ways and means of drawing sustenance from ourselves to nourish the monsters that we have been propagating at Washington. In other words to keep the constantly accumulating wheels of government oiled it has been found necessary to tap sources of revenue which should have been reserved for great critical emergencies. So the scientific management of government has become a matter of the utmost importance, and of this fact President Taft has taken cognizance. Contrary to the policy of his predecessor who opened up many new avenues of expenditure and left the Treasury in a desperate plight President Taft has been devoting himself to the task of cutting down expenses and simplifying the business of government. Furthermore he has designed a plan of scientific management the effect of which will be to put an end to the practice of looting the treasury in the interest of hungry constituencies for the greater glory of statesmen. The principle of this plan is the principle on which we are now proceeding to reform the banking and currency system, to revise the tariff and to amend the interstate commerce law. These things are to be done scientifically; that is, the necessary legislation is to be drawn in accordance with the reports of experts. Now President Taft purposes to have the principle applied to all matters of great importance; in short to have Congress informed before it acts, by non-partisan experts. He hopes, he says, to have adopted as a fixed national policy, impartial scientific study by experts preliminary to legislation with respect to rivers, harbors, waterways, public buildings, etc. When we begin doing business under this plan one of the greatest reforms in the history of the country will have been accomplished.

The Final Choice

 The point now is to make me feel Quite sure that I shall be the last."

A Christmas Legend

By Althea Gyles

"I'll mourn no more that Winter days are long;
I'll build a fire and sing a song.
Perchance some wayfarer unseen by me
Shall hear my song and go more heartily.

I'll open wide the door—a table spread
With herbs and honey, and with oaten bread.
Perchance some wanderer shall see the light
And find goodwill, and shelter for the night."

So said an exile in a hut of clay,
Snow-shrouded, on the Morn of Christmas Day.
Rich merchants passed, and laughed to see coarse bread,
Wild herbs, and honey, for a Feast Day spread.

And king and courtiers gave him alms unsought;
But all the day no wanderer asked him aught!
Yet, though no outcast came his Feast to share,
He entertained an Angel unaware!

A Christmas Week in London

By R. B. Cunninghame Graham

The roar of London slackened, and those pterodactyls of the streets, the motor-omnibuses, seemed to disport themselves like great Behemoth or Leviathan, reducing their creators to an inferior place, as if they lived upon the sufferance of the great whirring beasts.

The white-faced, hurrying, furtive-looking crowds, which throng the pavements for the most part of the year, had given place to multitudes of comfortable folk on shopping bent, who walked less warily than the work-driven slaves, who move about the streets seeming as if they felt that everybody's hand was armed against them, and that to halt a moment in the race exposed them to its blow. A biting frost clad hydrants in steel mail where water dropped from them, and spread white blotches on the wooden pavement at which the cab-horses, inured to petrol patches on the stones, to mud, even to blood after an accident, to paper blowing in their eyes, and all the myriad night noises of the town, shied as at something menacing, so far away had Nature gone out of their lives, as if no vision of green fields in which they played and raced beside their mothers, so stiltily upon their giraffe-looking legs, ever returned to haunt their labor-deadened brains.

The electric light shone blue against the trunks of trees, and the sharp cold almost dispelled the scent of horsedung which perfumes the air of London, as if to nullify all our attempts to set a bar between ourselves and other animals, and bring us face to face with their and our common necessities and origin, laughing at the refinements of material progress, and showing us that the one way by which we can escape the horrors of the world lies through the portals of the mind.

Peace upon earth, goodwill towards all mankind, was the stock phrase in every church, as if to make the bitterness of life outside more manifest, reducing as it did the preachers' words to a mere froth of wormwood on the air, or at the most a counsel of perfection towards which it was not worth one's while to struggle, seeing it set so far out of our reach.

Holiday-making crowds filled Piccadilly, which looked quite unfamiliar without its strings of crawling cabs and prostitutes, plying for hire upon its stones, as eventide drew near. One felt a sort of truce of God was in the air, and that the Stock Exchange, the sweating den, and the gigantic manufactory, in which a thousand toiled to make vast sums for some uninteresting and quite unnecessary man, were quiet, and that perhaps even the wretched negro in the indiarubber bush might have a day of rest.

The parks, under their canopy of white, turned fields again, and as the dusk came on, the sound of church bells in the air gave a false feeling of security, though one was well aware no tiger-hunted jungle held half the perils of the vast stucco solitude in which we live. Day followed day, cold, miserable and cheerless, and the town left deserted, by the myriads who make it look like some vast ant-hill, on which the ants all strive against each other, instead of helping one another after the fashion of their semi-reasonable prototypes, set one a-thinking on the Eastern legend, framed in a warm and sunny land, and therefore quite unfit for the chill north, which was the cause of such a change in life.

The frosty stars shone out, so cold and clear, they seemed but the reflections of some world extinct, which had preserved its light, but with the heat evaporated. The moon was more congenial to our northern blood, pale, passionless and with an air of infinite yearning after something unexpressed, whilst the full yellow beam of light of Jupiter recalled one to the plains where in far Nabotha the three kings sat gazing on the stars—a kingly occupation, and one which nowadays all their descendants have allowed to fall into disuse. Perhaps unwisely, for if they followed it, who knows if some particular bright star might yet arise on their horizon to guide them upwards out of the realms of self?

It may be too that all of us are kings born blind, and that the guiding star is shining whilst we sit sightless with our dim orbits fixed upon the mud. Or it may chance that motor-cars, arriving at the stable where the lowly Saviour babe was laid, would have affrighted all the humble company, for the gulf that yawns between the millionaire in his fur coat, and poverty, is wider far than that between the watchers by the ass and oxen's stall, and the three sheikhs who lighted down from off their horses to adore.

Nor was the gulf between the sheikhs, the watchers, and the animals stabled so snugly, with their warm breath making an aureole about the sleeping baby's head, or, folded on the plain beneath the stars, so deep as that which yawns between the modern dweller in our stucco Babylon and his selected breeds of animals rendered so bestial by improvement as scarce to move the pity of their owners for all their various pains.

At any rate, in that old cosmos, with its simple and unreasoning life, so like the life of plants and trees, as fixed and as immutable as are the seasons or the tides, there was a sympathy, unthought of, but all the same at hand, which though it did not spend itself in theories, redeemed mankind from many of its sins. Justice, one hears, is but of modern growth; but in its action on the lives of men it toils a thousand leagues behind the old brutality which, though it certainly denied all rights, admitted kinship, or at least was conscious of a link between all sentient things, just as some deity who had created man in his own image might feel ashamed when called upon to punish and destroy beings so like himself, though for all that he could not hold his hand.

So in the Christmas week, with its fierce cold and misery to thousands mocked by false protestations of the brotherhood of man, and pinched with hunger in the midst of wealth, it must have seemed that all the legend was but another of the corpse-candles lighted to set them running after its thin flame.

Then came a thaw, and all the iron-bound streets became Sloughs of Despond, in which a million horses, turned to machines, chained in their stables, and taken out but to pound ceaselessly upon the cruel stones till it was time to be led back again and chained up for the night, toiled wretchedly, not comprehending that they were agents in the progress of the world. But all the time the church bells pealed, and all the time the planets shone out soft and mellow, making one think involuntarily upon some old bright world which perhaps never has existed save in dreams, but which we now and then have to imagine for ourselves or else go mad at seeing ugliness revered as beauty, and wealth adored as wisdom, with all the meanest qualities of man enthroned as virtues, like a tin sky-sign setting forth some trash with its full-bodied lies. But frost or thaw, silence or traffic, all was the same to the vast vulgar town, the hugest monument of Philistinism that the world has seen.

The blackened muddy snow, reminding one somehow of something pure defiled, then scorned and cast upon the mire, lay piled in heaps in the chief squares, left there by accident or by design long after it was cleared from off the streets, as if to give the magnates in their shapeless palaces the mumps, and render them as hideous as the great cubes of masonry in which they lived. Misery seemed to reign triumphant in the wilderness of bricks, where dulness strove with smug hypocrisy to make life unendurable, whilst slowly the great city seemed to take up its usual course as the drear week drew out. Ladies in motor-cars, with the hard, uninviting air that wealth imparts so often even to youth and beauty, flitted past, scattering the mud on those whose toil paid for each article of dress they wore, as if they had conferred a favor on the world by deigning to exist. The chill and penetrating damp which rises from the London clay after a thaw, and makes its way into the bones and soul, to them was but another stimulus to life and aid to appetite. Neither the look of wretchedness of men or animals seemed to say anything to them, although no doubt their minds were all alive with charitable schemes; for never in the history of the human race has charity, that most unhumanizing virtue which has ever made mankind think

In Memory of Columbine---A Story

By W. M. Letts

the bedroom of Monsieur de Courcelles once loved an impression of great simplicity, but the simplicity rich in many harmonious elements. Religion and art, spirit and form, were blended into a beautiful unity.

The old Breton armoire stood against one wall, a large bookshelf against another. On the bookshelf was a small figure of Thorwaldsen's "Christ," on a bracket stood little busts of Dante, Marlowe, Shakespeare, Racine and Moliere. There were bright vases in dark corners, and carved chairs; and on an easel facing the wall a portrait of M. de Courcelles' wife, who had died six months after their marriage.

Those who have seen this room declare that its simplicity, its harmony, its air of thought, of culture, of piety, made them feel that they were in the bedroom of M. de Courcelles' innermost mind, which was believed by those who knew him to be a very beautiful and rare mind. But there was a incongruous note—an object so crude and ugly that one imagined the whole room protesting against it. Yet year after year remained there, in a conspicuous position near the bed. Indeed, there is no reason to suppose that it is not there now. This object was a figure of St. Anthony holding the Blessed Child. It was about eighteen inches in height, and made of wood, which was brightly painted. The dark brown robe of the saint was girded with a green sash; his eyes were brilliant blue, curiously outlined with black; his cheeks were rosy; in his right hand he held a tinsel lily; in his left hand, which was slightly malformed, he clasped the Blessed Child, who had no beauty whatsoever, but wore a very bright blue robe. Many people asked the story of the figure and the reason of its presence in the room. They suspected the saint of penitential origin. To some M. de Courcelles replied briefly that he kept it "in memory of Columbine"; but to one or two he told the story.

M. de Courcelles was intellectually a decadent. He loved dreams better than facts. He stood, as the Frenchmen stand, on the threshold of the unknown, waiting for a gleam, a sound from the vastness. He loved the shadows of the night, the labyrinthine ways of dreams, the mists of emotion, the dim forests of fancy, the sensations of sensation. He wrote books and poems which were understood by other dreamers, but not by the homely paterfamilias, the man of affairs, to be "rot," or its equivalent in French. But once M. de Courcelles wrote a children's play that was sufficiently definite in form to be generally admired. The play was called La Jeune Jeanette, but it is now forgotten, except, of course, by the few. At its conclusion there was a harlequinade, for M. de Courcelles saw in the old mirthful pantomime something world-old, world-young, something that speaks to men of the world's springtime, of its childhood; of its laughter and tears. It pleased his fancy to produce this harlequinade, with its types of the kind, at the end of his play; and it pleased his fancy, likewise, to assign its different parts to children. Harlequin, Pantaloon, Columbine, were little children.

At the first there was some difficulty in finding a Columbine suitable for the part; but one day a friend of M. de Courcelles saw in a poor quarter of Paris a little child who was dancing to the sound of a pipe. Though the dancing of children is always beautiful from the idea of youth it conveys, it is not always graceful; but this child displayed genius. Inquiries were made, and it was found that she lived with her aunt, the wife of a ragpicker. These people, who were respectable but very poor, objected strongly to the idea of the child's taking any part in the harlequinade. The stage had been the glory, the temptation and the ruin of her beautiful, weak-willed mother, Paqueline Mottoe, whose dancing had enchanted Paris a decade before this time, but whom Paris had forgotten when she died in poverty and shame, leaving her child, the little Marie, to her respectable, unadmired sister, the ragpicker's wife.

At last, however, their objections were overcome, and Marie took the part of Columbine, and reminded the world of the Jaqueline Mottoe whom they had forgotten. The play and the harlequinade were successful; they had a season of popularity. M. de Courcelles was pleased—so pleased, indeed, that he made a great self-sacrifice and invited all the children to a fete at his beautiful house. His sister, Madame Pelissier, and his housekeeper prepared the feast, and saw that the children had plenty to eat, and M. de Courcelles gave a pretty gift to each child and a new franc-piece. Although he had a grave and dreamy manner, he possessed that rare, inexplicable charm to which children are so sensitive. His little guests deserted Madame Pelissier and clung to M. de Courcelles. They showed no inclination for games, unless he played in them also; and at last, in desperation, he conducted a few of them to his beautiful bedroom, that they might amuse themselves with a collection of clever mechanical toys which were stored away in the armoire.

He was asked for minute explanations of every object in the room. His chest of drawers was rummaged, his cupboards explored. At that time there stood near the bed another St. Anthony. It was of marble, excellently sculptured. The saint was represented as a boy; and the youthful, delicate face seemed, if you looked at it suddenly, to smile at the Holy Child, who was so tenderly held in the boy's arms. It was the work of an Italian who had died in poverty in the Quartier Latin. But that morning an accident had occurred. A clumsy servant knocking over the pedestal, the figure had been dashed against the leg of the bedstead, breaking off the nose and the fingers of both hands, and entirely destroying the beauty of the work.

M. de Courcelles looked at this, regretfully while the little Columbine clung to his hand. "See," said he, "how quickly the work of months, perhaps of a lifetime, may be spoiled. My servant has broken the dream of one who is now dead, and I have lost my dear St. Anthony."

Warm fingers tightened on his. "Cannot Monsieur get another?"

"No, little one, I cannot get another St. Anthony; and I shall miss him every morning and evening."

"It is a great damage, Monsieur."

"It is, dear child, but I must resign myself, unless the saints send me another like it."

The hours of M. de Courcelles' self-sacrifice ticked themselves away. The children went home and left him to his dreams and his warm self-satisfaction.

It was two years after the performance of his play that he received a visit from a stranger, who was announced as the Abbe Cadie. M. de Courcelles was vexed by the interruption, but he rose with a courteous smile to receive his visitor. He saw a young priest with a sweet and placid face, dressed in the ordinary clerical dress, but more shabby and worn and shiny than M. de Courcelles had ever seen it.

"I hope you will forgive me, Monsieur, for disturbing you thus," the young man said presently, with a blush.

"But certainly, M. l'Abbe. I am at your service."

"Do you remember, then, Monsieur, a little girl called Marie Mottoe?"

M. de Courcelles went to the cupboard of his memory, but found no Marie Mottoe. He shook his head.

"She took the part of Columbine in your harlequinade of two years ago."

"Ah! Columbine. Yes, now I remember the child—a dear little girl with a genius for dancing. I can see her again; she had such an eager little pale face and such a lively mind that her thoughts seemed to be written in her eyes. How is she, then, Monsieur?"

"She is dying, I fear—or rather I think I hope it, for she has an evil inheritance from her poor mother, and her life would be either too hard or too fatally easy."

"Dying, Monsieur? You grieve me. What is the matter with her, poor child?"

"Hip disease."

M. de Courcelles shuddered. "How ugly, how inexplicable a thing is all disease! And she who danced so well!"

"Her aunt thinks it the judgment of heaven for the part she played in your harlequinade, and for her mother's sins."

"Poor little one! How hard these respectable people can be! But how did she get it?"

"She fell and sprained her leg. It was not treated properly. She is a delicate child, and the disease began and has progressed very quickly. The end is inevitable, but I hope it may be quick. For the dear little one is quite prepared."

The Abbe Cadie bent to pat the poodle's shaven back and—though this is not certain—to wink back his tears. For his monotonous, hard-working life knew one radiant passion, a singular devotion to children. He loved all his flock, even those sheep which were gray or black; but for the lambs he had a peculiar tenderness. He delighted to baptize them, to hear their confessions, to absolve their little childish offenses, to see them receive their first communion. He raised his head and looked at M. de Courcelles with wistful eyes. "This little one has a great devotion for you, Monsieur. Children cherish these ardent affections for those above them. The flame burns very brightly even when it is fed only by a dim remembrance. She has spoken of you often; it would please her very well if you sent her some message. She seems to have some little trouble on her mind—an anxiety, a restlessness which she does not explain; perhaps you could dissolve it by some kind words, which I would repeat."

He rose and stood there fingering his hat, looking at M. de Courcelles anxiously. The other rose too. "If M. l'Abbe will conduct me, I will go and see the little Columbine."

They went together to a poor street, and up a flight of stairs to a small but clean garret, which was decorated by a cheap print of the Crucifixion and a bright figure of the Madonna. A geranium stood in the window-sill, and not far from it was the little bed where Columbine lay.

1—CHARLES F. HANLON

By Edward F. O'Day

There was a time within the memory of most of us when the stage johnnie was one of San Francisco's most cherished institutions. Those were the days when the gay boys of all ages used to swarm out of the Pacific-Union and the Bohemian Club to toss their fat purses and their fickle hearts at the feet of the footlight favorites. The frowning keeper of the stage door had no sinecure then, the florists were hard put to it to supply the demand for American beauties and the champagne agents radiated prosperity. But today the race of johnnies within our gates is nearly extinct. Now and then we run across a battered old blade whose chalk stones and dyspeptic disposition are the only remains of his early triumphs and it may be that after the third glass he will discourse of the merry nights that are no more. He will probably lament the passing of his picturesque class and sorrow over the feeble temper of the modern youth whose homage is no longer given to the celebrities of the calcium light.

The old boy is pretty nearly correct. The race is extinct. The stage no longer lures as of old. But we may extract a melancholy sort of pleasure from the knowledge that one of those old-timers is still with us and that the passage of years has failed to rob him of his enthusiasm for the queens of the theater. Charles F. Hanlon is the last of the San Francisco johnnies.

Charles F. Hanlon's middle name is Fascination. For more years probably than he is willing to confess Charley has been fascinating the ladies of the stage. Like some of the charmers on whom he has exercised his winning ways, he has come down to us from a former generation, but age cannot wither or custom stale the infinite variety of his conquering graces. While many of his romantic dramas have been staged in this city, he is in reality a cosmopolitan and his paste board is honored at the stage doors of the Rue de l'Opera, Piccadilly and Forty-second street as well as on the local Rialto.

Charley can probably remember the time when he was not a johnnie but nobody else can. It is quite likely that he was already infatuated actresses in those faraway days when he was drinking knowledge at St. Ignatius College or mastering the quiddities of the law in John Burnett's office. Strange as it may seem, Charley has actually found time to devote to such serious avocations as learning and law. Although he has always been careful not to allow the pedestrian labors of his profession to interfere with his real career, it must be allowed that his intervals of legal labor have been richly rewarded. It is quite a commonplace thing for Charley to saunter into a case when there is nothing more exciting on the carpet, and to stroll out with a fee of fifty or seventy-five thousand dollars. Something of that fascination which he exerts over stage stars has its effect also on judges and juries. He wins suits at law as easily as he captures hearts and this is a fortunate characteristic, for Charley is enabled to spend on the stars what he earns in the courtroom. Many a beauty has reason to bless the day when he probated the Donohue will, for Charley drew down something like sixty thousand dollars when that bit of work was completed. Even if I knew I wouldn't tell how many diamonds, how many champagne suppers, how many cabs were paid for out of the eighty thousand dollars or so he earned in the famous Pratt case. And so it has always gone. The law has been a smiling and liberal mistress to Charley. He has achieved that conclusive distinction, the envy of less fortunate practitioners. Noting the crowds of litigants who throng his offices all day long, weighted down with retainers, they have manufactured the story that Charley hires idlers of both sexes at a dollar a day to sit in his waiting room and impress his importance upon his real clients. That of course is a canard. If you don't think so, ask him and see what he says. But it won't be easy to ask him if you go in business hours. You must wait your turn and even when your turn comes, you must run the gauntlet of Charley's "manager," a functionary who analyzes your business and passes judgment, from which there is no appeal, as to the propriety of your obtaining an audience.

Once you are admitted to Charley's inner office, you will be properly impressed. Charley has a taste for art and his sanctum is really a shrine of estheticism. The prevailing note would be rococo were it not for the photographs which give the room an atmosphere of art nouveau. The photographs of course are the pictures of stage beauties and there is a story for every picture, only casually indicated by the delicious superscriptions. Whose picture has the place of honor? Well, up to a short time ago it was the counterfeit presentment of Anna Held. She is shown not once but many times and on every photograph is an expression of her profound regard for Charles Fascination Hanlon. For Anna is a close friend of Charley's. So for that matter is Anna's husband, Freddie Ziegfeld. In Charley's opinion there is nothing too good for Anna, just as there is nothing too good for the rest of his theatrical friends. It was not so very long ago that Charley made one of his frequent visits to Europe. Charley goes to Europe so often that the captains of all the big steamers call him by his first name and Charley, not to be outdone, reciprocates. On the occasion of his last trip it happened that Anna Held was in Paris. It was the time of the big annual automobile show in Paris and Anna was naturally anxious to win a prize with her big car. Perhaps she mentioned her ambition to Charley; perhaps Charley, with that intuitive power which stands him in good stead in such matters, divined it before any word was spoken. But at any rate Charley summoned the best florist in Paris to the best hotel in Paris, where of course Charley had the best apartments in the house, and ordered him to decorate Miss Held's car for the show. The florist obeyed and of course Anna won the first prize. For a whole day Paris talked about the beauty of her flower-laden car. Is it any wonder that Charley has so many pictures of Anna?

But of late Charley has been worshipping at another altar. All the town knows who I mean. Lillian Russell with all her airy fairness has felt the charm of Charley's irresistible manner.

As soon as she came to the city Charley placed himself at her disposal. One of the first thing he did was to entertain her at a Press Club supper to which one hundred and fifty members of the club were invited. The speech which Charley made that night will live in the annals of the Press Club. For Charley is an amazing speechmaker. He likes to make speeches, if only for the purpose of finding excuse to tell his favorite stories. When the Press Club entertained Harry Lauder Charley was the only member who dared to regale Harry with a story. It was such an unusual story that Lauder afterwards that he couldn't forget it, much as he might try. But on the occasion of the Lillian Russell supper Charley told his most representative stories, weaving them together in a bouquet of words for the delectation of his beautiful guest. There was nobody present to take the speech down and probably it is just as well. Repetition spoils such things. They should live in their immortality only in the memory of those who heard them. That is one of the reasons why I shall not attempt to summarize Charley's speech or repeat any of his stories.

That supper was the least of the things Charley did for Lillian. He placed his automobile at her disposal and then, when he saw how much she enjoyed honking about town, he presented her with a big motor car. It cost $5,000 but it is a bagatelle to Charley. "Darn the expense," has always been his motto in such matters. It is any wonder that Miss Russell's picture has been given a prominent position in Charley's sanctum?

I have not by any means exhausted the catalogue of Charley's claims to fame. I might tell of his wonderful collection of music which includes every score and every song of any merit that has been published in Europe for years past. I might tell how he officiates at the auction post on the ocean steamers. I might tell of the celebrated drink, consisting of equal portions of port and champagne, which he invented. But these are details. Charles Fascination Hanlon, first of all a johnnie, the last of the class in San Francisco, and when some faroff day shall he put an end to his career, a chorus from fair lands in many lands will fervently exclaim, "We shall look upon his like again."

Merry Christmas

By William J. Lampton

And Christmas!
 What a day it is,
 With earth and air full of the fizz
 And sparkle of champagne;
 And yet a better thing than that,
 For all may take it,
 Free as air,
 When Christmas time is everywhere,
 Not quite as much to some,
 Perhaps,
 As unto others; not all of us
 May have the "snaps"
 Of this good world of ours;
 And yet he is unworthy who will let
 The shadows follow him Or his
 When Christmas time is what it is,
 And loses much of happiness
 Because it happens he has less Than others have. Gadzooks! Perhaps They'd like the chance to swap their "snaps"
 For his; and glad could they arrange
 With this same coveter to change.
 But even they should not repine;
 The rich may let their treasure shine
 So that although their lot be sad,
 They may be able to make glad Those less unhappy; those—but why Bring in the semblance of a sigh
 To mar the Christmas song?
 At Christmas there is nothing wrong;

An ache, a debt, a heavy heart
 Must be considered as a part Of Christmas time; a spot to make
 The light a brighter radiance take.
 There is enough for all; God gives
 To every human thing that lives
 Some chance at gladness; something to Transfer in his own way the blue
 That's in your lives into your sky
 Till every heavy cloud rolls by;
 And Christmas is the time. Come all Look up, look up; there is no pall Of gray
 And blackness hung today
 Above the Merry Christmas way,
 For in your hearts must roses bloom
 In Christmas color and perfume.
 Divide your blessings and your cares,
 Give half of yours; take half of theirs;
 Forget the rest. What odds, if, what You think you want you haven't got!
 There may be others; can it be
 In this you have no company?
 Ah, no, a million others would Be something other if they could.
 But let that go; there's plenty yet
 To make you happy and forget.
 Brace up, stand up, look up, and cheer
 For Christmas—one time of the year
 When merry bells shall gayly ring
 And all the world shall laugh and sing.

Some Observations About Opera

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Now that all the critics who discovered Tetrizzini have been from, I hope you will permit me to suggest that perhaps "Doc" Leahy is deserving of a little bit of credit for having appreciated choice when he heard it in the City of Mexico. Leahy we are all indebted for having introduced us to the great Italian diva. And by the way Tetrizzini wasn't the only artist in the company that Leahy brought to the Tivoli. There was a mezzo-soprano in that company by the name of Berlindi, a young woman and one of the greatest singers ever heard in this country. The critics didn't rave over her very much because hers is not the voice for vocal gymnastics. She runs and fancy tricks on high notes, and these are the things that captivate the critics. If they good straight singing, no matter how brilliant, if it isn't florid, they're not enthused. So Berlindi got away with faint praise. She went to Paris and I have never heard of her since. One day, perhaps, she will be heard in London, for she is young yet, has many years to go before reaching the age at which Tetrizzini became known to the English-speaking world. Depend on it that if London ever hears her it will appreciate her art and excite the curiosity of New York. Then of course San Francisco will be no exception. One word more: speaking of Tetrizzini Leahy, is he not to be consulted by the folk who are talking about building a big opera house here? There is no theatrical manager in America who has had more experience in opera than our own "Doc" Leahy, and of course he is not to be shelved by the local millionaires who seem to be of the opinion that if they get in touch with the Metropolitan Company of New York all will go well. Perhaps he will wake up to find that fashionable opera is not always good opera, and that it might be possible to give even a company from the Metropolitan successful opposition. Let us not forget that second-rate company that was singing to first-rate prices at the Grand Opera House in earthquake week. The inability of one swallow to make a summer is not more pronounced than that of a Caruso to make successful an operatic production.

Our Educated Lawyers

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: As a member of the bar of this State I wish to rebut a certain proposition made by you, to-wit: "There are not twenty-five well educated lawyers in California." It appears to me that you have no very extensive acquaintance among lawyers since you have committed yourself to something absolutely untenable. Either that or what you understand by "education" is not what the word implies according to general acceptance. If your proposition is that there are not in California twenty-five lawyers who have a polished taste, a cultivated reason, a useful amount of book-learning and a knowledge of fundamental principles in various sciences together with a familiarity with the ornamental branches of learning then you are unquestionably in error. I can name over a hundred lawyers in California who are notable for the completeness of their education; nay, lawyers of profound erudition and brilliance of polished intellect. Without the slightest reflection or the aid of the roster of our celebrated Bar Association I will suggest to you a few of the many lawyers who have the mental equipment to win peculiar distinction in any bar in the country. I will head the list with Professor Boke of Berkeley who, I know, is not unknown to you since I have frequently seen his name in Town Talk. Doubtless Professor Boke is in your list of less than twenty-five. But how about Mr. William Savage and Mr. H. M. Willis, the bright luminaries of the Los Angeles bar? Let me inform you, sir, that the average of intellect in the Los Angeles bar is very high. There are several lawyers in Los Angeles quite as talented as our own Frank Schilling, than whom there is none more thoroughly educated in the dips, spurs and angles of his profession. From Los Angeles I come to Merced and point out the Hon. William Langdon, the headliner of his class, ranking even with our Daniel O'Connells, Barclay Henleys, Percy Longs and Abe Friedlanders. If it were not for the space that I know you grudge me, Mr. Editor, I could supply you with names enough to fill a column of your valuable journal, names of men not less brilliant than those I have mentioned, and that without even going to the bench where such talented men as Dunne abound.

—Attorney.

Is Los Angeles for New Orleans?

The New York Sun makes the charge that Los Angeles favors the claim of New Orleans to the Panama Canal Exposition. The Sun in a recent issue quoted the following squib from the Los Angeles Times: "If San Francisco does not get that Panama Exposition it will not be because the claiming department was not running a double turn." The Sun then comments as follows: "If Los Angeles were a real seaport on Santa Monica Bay it would be a clamorous rival of San Francisco for the honor of holding the Panama Exposition. But as the case stands Los Angeles supports the claim of New Orleans." The Sun is usually the soul of accuracy. Is it possible that its editorial head has nodded in this instance? Or has it the "dope" on Los Angeles? The answer to these queries must come from below the Techaçhapi.

Harvard Explodes a Fallacy

The undergraduate hallucination which assumes an "entire absence of any connection between examination grades and post-collegiate success," receives another blow in the results of a recent investigation at Harvard upon new lines. The criterion of success hitherto employed, namely, the appearance of a name in "Who's Who in America," has been widely objected to, and, accordingly, a new standard has been taken for the latest comparison. The class of 1894 at Harvard was selected for analysis. Three men, one of whom was Dean Briggs, were asked to select from this class the names of those men who, during their fifteen years since graduation, had achieved distinct success, each judge determining for himself his definition of that term. Twenty-three members of the class were selected as deserving of this recognition by at least two of the three judges. The college records of these men were then compared with those of twenty-three of their classmates chosen at random, and it was found that there were between three and four times as many "A's" among the former as among the latter, the exact figures being 196 and 56. This will be a hard saying for the students who are so sure that it is always the low-grade "good fellows" that become speedily eminent.

The Baiting of "Dunc"

Down in Santa Cruz they are having the time of their lives making fun of Editor "Dunc" McPherson's appointment to the Agnew Insane Asylum board. Here is the way the editor of the News treats "Dunc":

"The Watsonville Register takes itself too seriously. It mourns over the fact that the two evening papers of Santa Cruz are joshing the 'Seer of Santa Cruz' on his appointment to the Agnew Insane Asylum. If the Register only knew 'Dunc' McPherson's capacity for the assimilation of gratis publicity, especially that provided by his contemporaries in Santa Cruz, it would dry its tears and cease wailing. It is related of 'Dunc' that in the old days when he and 'Artie' were exhausting gallons of ink in one of their illuminating word battles, he would ask the reporter in the afternoon when the Surf arrived if there was 'anything in that sheet about him.' If there wasn't he wouldn't look at it. If there was he would devour it and prepare another inky onslaught for the next morning's Sentinel. Verily, 'Dunc' will have more fun and satisfaction in taking that job at Agnew, amid the thunder of the enemy's guns, than he would have in stealing over there under cover of darkness unaccompanied by any newspaper announcements."

"Artie" is Arthur Taylor, editor of the Surf.

Mendacity and Cyclones

The Santa Cruz Sentinel quotes from the King City Rustler a short item which it uses as a text for a sermon on the mendacious proclivities of newspapermen. The Sentinel may be correct. The item is as follows and I have my doubts about its absolute verity:

"A cyclone out West turned a well inside out, a cellar upside down, moved a township line, blew the staves out of a whisky barrel and left nothing but the bung hole, changed the day of the week, blew a mortgage off a farm, blew all the cracks out of a fence and knocked the wind out of a politician."

The Rivalry of Sacramento and Stockton

The Sacramento Bee had an article praising Sacramento's transportation facilities a few days ago, in the course of which it was stated offhand that Sacramento was the "Common Center" of the Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys. That made the editor of the Stockton Mail hot and he seems to have the better of the argument. Listen:

"If Sacramento has a right to boast because it is on two transcontinental railroads, what shall be said of Stockton, which is on three? The Bee describes the electric railroad systems which center there, but Stockton is the southern terminus of one of those systems and derives more benefit from it than Sacramento does. Moreover, Stockton is the center of an extensive transportation system, including the new railroad to Linden, the Southern Pacific branch to Milton and Oakdale, the connections by two lines with the Sierra railroad and the three transcontinental roads that pass through the city. To these should be added the two electric railroads to Modesto now in course of construction and the river craft. Our "mosquito fleet" of launches serves practically the same purpose as a network of electric lines, for the launches collect freight from the rich delta region and bring it to Stockton for distribution."

Obedient Persia

A little item in the foreign news, obscured by the record of bigger happenings, is luminous of the fate of Persia. The Persian Government, in obedience to the associated orders of London and St. Petersburg, has undertaken to reorganize its army and police. On applying to the allies for permission to hire instructors it is told that it may engage any foreign officers it chooses, provided they are not Germans, and it had select Italians.

Berlin Police and Hatpins

The Berlin police president, Herr von J., has opened a campaign against ladies who long hatpins. He promulgates an official setting forth that hatpins of this description constitute a "grave peril" to the public, especially in tramway cars. Herr von Jagow calls upon ladies of Berlin either to confine themselves to pins which do not protrude beyond the brim of their hats, or at least to wear guards on the ends of long pins. "I venture to express the conclusion," Herr von Jagow, "that it will require this hint on my part to do away with mischievous and dangerous habit and that it is not necessary for me to resort to other measures to eradicate it." The Lokal Anzeiger remarks that the modern woman is unlikely to tolerate any dictation affecting her apparel from so mighty an authority as Herr von J.

A New Sudan Fuel

Experiments have recently taken place in many in connection with the manufacture of new fuel out of the papyrus and other reeds which cover a large area, estimated at 100,000 square miles, on the upper reaches of the Nile, and obstruct navigation. It is proposed to "disintegrate" these reeds, which are generally known as "sudd," reducing them to powder, which will be compressed into the form of briquettes. No binding material will be necessary. An Anglo-German syndicate has formed to promote the manufacture. Representatives of the Sudan Government and of the British and German admiralties were present at the trials. The promoters claim that the sudd fuel can be put on the market at a price thirty to forty per cent cheaper than that of coal, and is the fuel at present used on the Nile steamers and in the locomotives on the railways. It is understood that the idea of utilizing the sudd originally suggested itself to the principal man promoter in consequence of a sentence quoted from one of Lord Cromer's reports.

ur bettors are not actuated by sentiment. They figure odds on conditions as they find them, as they would like them to be. Some times, of course, they find that their estimate of conditions is wrong. Let us hope that it will be so in the matter of the Panama Exposition. I am told that Tom Corbett, the pool room man, has $100 to bet at even money that San Francisco will not get the fair. I am also informed that all bettors who would be willing to hazard money at two to one in favor of San Francisco will not touch the even money bet. A few days ago Jimmy Coffroth made a private bet of $100 at even money that this city would not succeed in getting the exposition. He expressed himself as being willing to bet ten times that amount. At the same time Coffroth who is a loyal San Franciscan says that he would be glad to lose the bet. As a betting man he trusts his judgment but as a San Franciscan he knows that judgment may be incorrect.

of the wallet he converted into the coin of the realm and tried his luck again. It had changed. He began to win. Indeed he couldn't lose. He played no system, but haphazardly he put down his money, and his winnings piled up till he grew feverish with excitement. Thousands of dollars came to him before he lost a cent. He kept on and on until overcome with weariness, and then he went to his hotel and counted his fortune. He found himself the possessor of one hundred thousand dollars. The next day he left Monte Carlo. When he started for Europe it was with the intention of staying six months. When he saw San Francisco again six years had elapsed since his departure.

inaugural ball is to Sacramento what the coronation ceremony is to London. The interdiction of the ball means to the business interests of Sacramento what the prohibition of the Jeffries-Johnson fight meant to the business interests of San Francisco. Modistes and milliners have been hard hit by Mr. Johnson's progressive notion of the appropriateness of Democratic simplicity in affairs of State. The florists are bemoaning the loss of profits which they had prematurely estimated. Hotel men are filled with melancholy when they think of the throng that will not materialize. The caterers, the restaurant men, the tailors, the purveyors of furnishing goods—all have been heaping maledictions on the head of Sacramento's native son, who of all men should have been the last to deal so foul a blow to the fair metropolis of Northern California.

Pruriency in Los Angeles

Critics have told us that plays of the Zaza type make quickest and surest appeal to women. This is a libel against the sex, yet occasions arise that give it something of the appearance of truth. Take for instance the contest over "Lucky" Baldwin's estate. The newspapers tell us that the courtroom in Los Angeles where the contest is in progress is packed with women who strain their ears to catch the spicy details of the "love affair" which is the chief element of interest. Now if a theatrical manager were to put on a play frank with the lust and smut of that so-called "love affair" he would be run out of some towns on a rail. Of the French plays that reflect the life of Parisian sumps and appeal to callowness and senility either through the medium of glorified hetairas with spangled careers or burnt-out slatterns of the quay-side there is not one that I know of approximating in raciness or shameless effrontery the drama now evoking feminine attention in a temple of justice in Los Angeles. There was never anything of love between "Lucky" Baldwin and Lillian Ashley. The story of their carnal relations is the sordid, salacious story of the intercourse of a libertine and a trull. Lillian Ashley began her career as an adventuress in quest of a man with money, and she had no qualms of conscience to be assuaged by the formality of a marriage ceremony. Not even so much as a promise of marriage did she make a pre-requisite to the yielding of what she had to dispose. Proof of all this is in letters of her own writing, letters about the genuineness of which there is no dispute, and the indecency and nastiness of which cannot even be hinted. These are the letters for which feminine ears have been strained in the beautiful, moral city of Los Angeles.

Melancholy Broods in Sacramento

From Sacramento comes a wail that is almost heartrending. It is the wail of the inhabitants over Governor-elect Johnson's interdiction of the inaugural ball. Sacramento's sorrow is greater than the newspapers have permitted us to know. I had the impression that the only persons who were aggrieved at the banning of the ball were the lovers of social gaiety who had been looking forward to the event with joyous expectation. But I have learned that the disappointment suffered by Sacramento's business interests is much greater than that of the social elect. The

That Sick University

W. Russell Cole's interesting series of articles in the Call on "Stanford: A Sick University" present a great deal of useful information for diagnostic purposes. Mr. Cole makes it quite clear that the big university at Palo Alto is afflicted with Jordanitis, a disease that is gnawing voraciously at its vitals. Mr. Cole's service to the university in giving us the results of his painstaking inquiry will prove of great value provided the regents act on the information which he has supplied. But hitherto the regents have acted on the theory that the university being a private institution was above public criticism, and they have indulged President Jordan out of deference to what they believe to be the wishes of the founder. This is not a broad view to take of their duty. The university is enjoying certain valuable favors vouchsafed by the people of this State, and the regents ought to be mindful of that fact. Furthermore as the success of the institution is a matter of considerable importance to the people of the State the regents ought to feel that whatever is inimical to the welfare of the university it is their duty to take cognizance of even though sentimental considerations should dictate to the contrary.

A Sidelight on Jordan

Mr. Cole's articles have a twofold interest: they explain what the matter is with Leland Stanford Jr. University, and they enable us to

New Orleans Boosters Here

There have been a number of New Orleans boosters in the city and apparently they had a lot of money to spend. Just why they should boost the rival city as the field of their boosting is pretty difficult to figure out, unless they want to make the tenuous claim that sentiment is not unanimous here. They went to work in peculiar fashion, offering to waiters in the big hotels and hotels five dollars a day for wearing exposition buttons. To barbers they offered as much. Naturally they found a good many who were willing to accept this "easy money." Frank Tait found a number of the waiters in his establishment wearing the buttons and nearly threw a fit. He fired every last one of them on the spot.

the Tiger's Lair

A good story of a gambler's luck was told the other day apropos the turning loose of the tiger in our midst. The raconteur was reminded of the story by the report that Henry Sch who is one of the most inveterate of our gamblers of the goddess of chance had lost $45,000 while sitting in Frank Daroux's establishment. The story is of a grand nephew of Levi Strauss who started for Europe many years ago with $10,000 in cash and a letter of credit for $10,000. Arriving in New York he found his way to a gambling game where he lost his cash. Then he took a steamer for Europe, and on his arrival there he made a bee line for Monte Carlo. In twenty-four hours after reaching that resort he found himself at a table without a cent in his pocket. From some friends he borrowed several hundred dollars and this money soon vanished. Then he went to his hotel and searched every suit of clothes he had for stray coins. He found a few dollars, went back to the gaming table and again lost what he had. Presently he remembered that in his trunk was a small wallet of rare coins that he had been gathering for years. The contents gauge the mental calibre of a man who is generally recognized as a leader of national thought—Professor David Starr Jordan. As the proper study of mankind is man, so to know a people you must study the men to whom the people look for light and example. Let us study David Starr Jordan in the light of an incident embalmed in the Cole series illustrative of the Jordan view of the amenities of college journalism. "This morning," said Dr. Jordan to the editor of a college paper, "I learned that the roof of a building belonging to a particular department was leaking, and I was requested to provide other quarters. I made arrangements at once, and the department was moved. Now, suppose that you, the editor of a college publication, had heard of this before I did, and had editorially suggested the change. Then I could not have allowed it to be made, for in that case I would have been submitting to student dictation." Is it any wonder that things have been going wrong down at Palo Alto where the habit of philosophic thought is cultivated at the feet of Jordan!

Tom O'Connor's Peroration

Tom O'Connor, the attorney, won a murder case last Saturday. This in itself is not surprising, for O'Connor has a way of winning criminal cases, but it happened that this was the case of one Nathan Pollack who had killed his wife. Wife-killers are very hard to acquit and two of the best criminal lawyers in this city had refused to take the case before O'Connor tackled it. They couldn't see where there was a chance to save Pollack from hanging and they didn't want to imperil their professional standing by losing the case. O'Connor took the case and got an acquittal on the first ballot. In his peroration O'Connor moved the jury to tears. "If you convict Pollack," he pleaded, "It will be a sad day for me. The sun won't shine for me and the birds won't sing, if this man is convicted" and more to the same effect. Another lawyer listened to this peroration and mused. "The sun won't shine for O'Connor if Pollack is convicted? The birds won't sing for O'Connor if Pollack is convicted? Well, well! But won't it also be a bit inconvenient for Pollack?"

The Return of the Modocs

Thirty-two years ago the Modoc Indians broke out of the Klamath reservation and went on the war path, with what obstreperous results the pioneers of northern California and southern Oregon still vividly remember. When they were finally pacified they were punished by exile to New Mexico and have been there ever since. Two years ago the Congress removed their disabilities and they are now about to return from Oklahoma to their old home. They will return to find themselves quite well fixed, for every one of them will receive an allotment of eighty acres of argicultural land or one hundred and sixty acres of grazing land. As most of them possess land in Oklahoma they will thus become landed proprietors on a very respectable scale. They will also get their share of the tribal funds derived from the sale of Indian lands in the Klamath agency. Verily Uncle Sam, in forgiving them, has heaped coals of fire upon their heads.

Margaret and Ed at Breakfast

In the latest issue of one of the eastern periodicals which is devoted exclusively to theatrical pictures and articles, there is a full-page picture of Mr. and Mrs. Edward J. Bowes "at breakfast in their charming home at Tacoma." It is a charming picture of domestic bliss, but the domestic bliss of Ed Bowes and Margaret Illington has been so frequently described, by Edward, by Margaret and by the newspapermen, that there is no need to dwell upon it here. The picture is remarkable in another way. It shows Ed Bowes dressed in dinner coat and black tie with a glass of wine beside his plate. It shows Margaret Illington in a low-cut gown and a pearl necklace. These, I take it, constitute new breakfast fashions and are therefore worthy of being chronicled.

The Porter Dinner

Mr. W. S. Porter, the well known first vice-president and general manager of the Associated Oil Company, gave a dinner to his associates of the company in the banquet room of the Tait-Zinkand Cafe one evening last week. Among those who were present I noted the names of William F. Herrin and Colonel J. C. Kirkpatrick, both of whom are very prominent in the affairs of Associated. It was one of the most elaborate private spreads we have had in a long time, the dinner, exclusive of wine, costing twenty dollars a cover. The decorators outdid themselves. But the prime feature of the affair was the vaudeville entertainment with which Porter regaled his guests. Porter had a reputation to sustain, his dinner of last year having been embellished with stunts which have been talked of ever since. And he did not disappoint. There were many thrills in the vaudeville show and when it was over the most blasé sighed and longed for more.

Templeton Crocker's Valet

Templeton Crocker has a colored valet who is quite a character. He says many droll things which Crocker takes considerable delight in repeating to his friends. A few days ago the black boy entered the elevator of the St. Francis Hotel and asked to be taken to the fifth floor on which are his master's apartments. "Did you say seven

A Wonderful Pianist is Benoist

Nat Landsberger who ought to know, tells me that Andre Benoist, the young Parisian who plays the piano for Tetrassini, is one of the most wonderful performers that he has ever heard of. As Nat has heard all the greatest pianists during the last twenty-five years this is no mean endorsement. A few nights ago Benoist and Frederic Hastings dined with Mr. and Mrs. Landsberger at their home in O'Farrell street and after dinner Benoist expressed a desire to play. On Nat's piano was the Rubinstein sonata in A minor which Nat tells me is one of the longest and most difficult sonatas ever written. Benoist had never seen it before, a fact which need not surprise anybody, for there are hundreds of great sonatas and no pianist knows them all. But Benoist sat down at the piano and played the Rubinstein sonata through without missing a note. Not once did he hesitate in his reading of the most intricate passages. It was as though a Greek scholar should pick up a long and difficult ode of Pindar and translate it into beautiful English at sight. Benoist, by the way, married a beautiful New Orleans girl who lived for quite a while in this city. She died, leaving him two beautiful children, and he subsequently married her aunt who was of about the same age.

Frederick Hastings' Wife

By the way, I have not seen it mentioned that Frederick Hastings, the baritone who is traveling with Tetrizzini, is the husband of a California girl. He married dainty little Miss Brooke Rie, the daughter of A. H. Rose of this city in the niece of Mrs. Selden S. Wright. She was ever prominent in social circles here, being a member of the Colonial Dames and of the Albert Sney Johnstone Chapter of the Daughters of the Confederacy. The wedding took place last year in New York at the famous "Little Church around the Corner." Mrs. Hastings did not come here with her husband, owing to the shortness of the tour. They have a charming home in New York where visiting Californians are royally entertained. Besides being with Tetrizzini Hastings has sung with Nordica, Liza Lehmann and other great stars. Owing to his lack of familiarity with our mutable climate he did not take proper precautions before the first Tetrizzini concert and contracted a cold. The result was that his splendid baritone voice was not heard to good advantage.

Eatanswill Journalism

A spirited rebuke is what Mr. Pott of the Eatanswill Gazette would pronounce the retort of Mr. Haack of the Watsonville Register looked from Mr. "Pop" Cahill, the "Candid Friend" of our own dear old Sunday Call. The rebuke was deserved. For Mr. Haack had made a most brutal assault on Mr. Cahill. The assault was in violation of all the amenities of journalism. On the testimony of Mr. Cahill's counter-presentment hitherto printed on the "Candid Friend" page, presumably to show that Mr. Cahill's face was the mirror of his thoughts, Mr. Haack described him as a "venerable pelican" with "a cranium just about large enough to hold any matter enough sufficient to scramble an egg." Now Mr. Cahill had done nothing to merit such rough treatment at the hands of the Watsonville editor. True, Mr. Haack says that Mr. Cahill has asserted that the Democratic party was without brains or honesty, a statement which the bucolic editor characterized as "small and apparently of the same calibre as the diminutive thinktank from which it emanated." But according to Mr. Cahill in his spirited retort Mr. Haack "garbled a printed statement for use as a peg on which to hang some stupid and vulgar personal abuse." "I did not say," says Mr. Cahill, "that the Democratic party had neither brains nor honesty, but that the leaders were deficient in those respects." And disdaining though he does both stupid and vulgar personal abuse, Mr. Cahill, with all the fervor of the Pickwickian Pott amiably descends to the level of his assailant. Just to show that he can be fully as caustic as the man who described him as a "venerable pelican" Mr. Cahill alludes to his Eatanswill contemporary as a "jacksnipe." Sneered at for the size of his cranium Mr. Cahill with superb humor ridicules the name of Haack, and reflects that it seems to fit his hated contemporary pretty closely. Thus is the scar of wrath scorched into the Watsonville editor with the sparkling and pointed flame of Mr. Cahill's wit. But this is not all. Ridicule which is said to be the first and last argument of fools is not at an end. There was something said of Mr.

THE HAMMER THROWER

One of the latest productions of Haig Patigian, the most brilliant of California sculptors.

Cahill's diminutive thinktank. The wound rankles. Mr. Haack is answered further in his own language thus: "You could not, with the aid of a surgical operation, introduce an idea to the head of a malicious and disappointed partisan." How original in conception! How biting the mockery of it! And now that spleen has been gratified the case stands thus: Mr. Cahill, who has contempt for personal abuse, holds not that the Democratic party is deficient in brains and honesty but that the leaders are. He is prepared to argue that the maxim, "People get the kind of government they deserve" is not to be paraphrased to apply to political parties. And doubtless he will stand by his guns; which means that he will insist that Governor-elect Dix, Governor-elect Harmon, Governor-elect Woodrow Wilson, Governor-elect Baldwin, Governor-elect Foss and Champ Clark are deficient in brains and honesty. This is not personal abuse. In the meantime the suggestion may not be taken amiss that there are few spectacles so sure in their appeal to universal human sympathy as that of the journalistic artist in vituperation distinguished for his contempt for the rights and feelings of others and for his tone of unscrupulousness in discussion, exhibiting with a whine his own galled withers.

Our Premier Sculptor

Haig Patigian, I hear, is to sculpture the allegorical figures for the new Hall of Justice. The work could be entrusted to no better hands in these parts. Patigian never does anything that is not poetic in conception, and his work is always in good taste, never eccentric. He is especially successful in his execution of nudes and heroic figures. A self-restrained artist, the sincerity of his work is always apparent in the spirit of the effects that he achieves. A good specimen of his workmanship is "The Hammer Thrower," a most gracefully modelled figure every line of which denotes strength and elasticity.

The Jocosity of Leavitt

Frank Leavitt of Oakland, for several years one of the most valuable men in the State Legislature, was beaten in the last primary by Ed Tyrrell who is the private secretary of Mayor Mott. Leavitt made a hot fight and when he found that his pitcher had gone to the well once too often he showed himself a good loser. He can even joke about his defeat. Last week the Elks of Oakland gave a Forty-nine Mining Camp celebration in their fine club rooms in Fourteenth street and Leavitt was chosen to act as sheriff. In his sheriff's office he had a pair of heavy leg irons which he took delight in showing to visitors. "These," he explained gravely, "are the irons which Tyrell put on Leavitt. Ollie Cooper Goes to New York

Patrons of the Alcazar and the old Central remember little Ollie Cooper as a clever youngster who played all sorts of children's parts in such a way as to give evidence of considerable acting talent. They will be pleased to learn that "little" Ollie Cooper has become a young woman capable of handling ambitious roles and that she is about to have her opportunity on Broadway. When James K. Hackett organized a touring company at the conclusion of his engagement in this city, Ollie Cooper was one of those whom he enlisted. She made good on the road and received many encomiums from Hackett. But the tour was not a success and Hackett was compelled to disband his company in Winnipeg. William A. Brady, who is Hackett's manager, had despatched a representative to find out what was the trouble with the company when its financial statements began to show a balance on the wrong side of the sheet, and when the company was disbanded this representative whose name is Hatch thought so much of Miss Cooper's capabilities that he offered to find her an engagement in one of the Brady companies in New York. So Miss Cooper is going to have the chance for which all ambitious young women on the stage are so eager. No doubt she will repeat the old story of young Californians who go to Broadway, by making good in emphatic fashion.

They Owe Us Medals

Major Ben Truman, bon vivant, raconteur, journalist, civil war veteran and a well known figure in Los Angeles life, made his annual visit to San Francisco last week and was entertained by some of his old friends. Major Truman is an authority on world's fairs, having attended several in an official capacity. He was at the fair in New Orleans in 1884-5, and he says that it was a miserable failure. He suggests that if the Southern sense of propriety were still keen in New Orleans the people of that city would withdraw from the present contest out of consideration of the fact that they still owe California twenty-two gold and silver medals that were awarded to California by the Crescent City twenty-five years ago. One day at the Palace Major Truman was discussing affairs in Los Angeles, and he paid a glowing tribute to General Otis. He says that Los Angeles is indebted for at least one hundred thousand of its population to the courage of the proprietor of the Times. Incidentally he made the statement that though Otis is generally regarded as an implacable, uncompromising foe of labor the truth is he approves the principle of trades-unions and not only concedes the right of wage earners to strike but is in sympathy with them whenever they strike because of the unfairness of employers. Major Truman, by the way, figured prominently in President Johnson's Administration during the reconstruction period. He investigated conditions in the South in company with Henry Watterson and Carl Schurz, and Johnson's policy was in consonance with the findings of Major Truman who successfully combatted the arguments of Schurz.

Roth and Michelson in New York

Two more names may be added to the imposing roster of San Franciscans who have made good in New York. They are the names of Herbert Roth, the artist, and Marian Michelson, the reporter, and curiously enough, they are both making their New York success on the World. In the last issue of the Sunday World I have seen, their names appear together on the first page of the "metropolitan section" which is devoted to an interesting article about the grand opera star Trentini, written in a vivacious style by Michelson and illustrated with comic pictures by Roth. Both of these youngsters—for they are only half way through their twenties—received their newspaper training on the Bulletin. Roth left here a couple of years ago for European study, married in London, and has not returned to San Francisco since. Michelson deserted the local newspaper field several months ago and found no difficulty in making good in the metropolis. He belongs to a newspaper family. One of his aunts is Mrs. Arthur McEwen and another is Miss Miriam Michelson, the author of "In the Bishop's Carriage."

A Story of a Chauffeur

From the Hawaiian Gazette I have extracted the following story which seems to prove that the automobile lad who chuffs in San Francisco has no bowels of mercy or compassion. For the sake of our fair name I hope the story is exaggerated, but I am, pretty much inclined to think that it is true. Here is the way "The Bystander" of the Gazette tells it:

Lorin Andrews does not give one the impression of being a "come-on," even when he dons his white helmet and assumes a British accent. Neither is he an easy mark. Of course, he explains, up in San Francisco they need the money and the end sometimes justifies the means, except at primaries. Andrews spent six weeks and everything else he had in Frisco, where, like everyone else who goes up from Honolulu, he was presented around as "a wealthy sugar planter." It was worth paying for, that title, and there was only one incident that appeared to him to be on the coarse side, a way rather raw. It happened, one afternoon, that he had no dinner engagement and he foresaw a lonely meal. However, climbing into a machine at a public stand, he told the driver to take him to some good table d'hote eating house. The machine got there in seven minutes and then the idea the Honolulu to be a good fellow. "Have you had your dinner, chauffeur?" he asked, in the warmest precinct-meeting voice. The chauffeur had not. "Then come in and eat with me; I'll be all alone." The chauffeur would be pleased to accept the kind invitation. To show his Hawaiian hospitality, Andrews blew the chance of a six-dollar check and threw in a bit of smoke at the end. Then, stepping out to him to return to his hotel, he met an old acquaintance. Andrews fell on his neck and decided to walk with the long-lost friend. Turning to the chauffeur he asked: "Oh, what do I owe you for bringing me down here?" The chauffeur pulled out his watch. "Let me see. It is three o'clock since we left the garage. Fifteen dollars, please." Andrews thought of the dinner, which he had only paid for, but now had to pay the chauffeur fifteen dollars for eating. "But I paid you and I never batted my eye," tells Andrews.

Learn About "Jack the Ripper"

The enterprising police reporter in Los Angeles has tried to establish the identity of "the Ripper," the infamous White-chapel murderer, by a cock and bull story of a would-be murderer arrested in the southern city who returned to the London fiend in his insane wanderings. I am afraid this police sensation will fall flat. The identity of "Jack the Ripper" was established years ago, though the fact was never made public. Those who are familiar with unbroken police annals know that "The Ripper" was a celebrated London physician who at one time treated King Edward and who had attacks of murderous insanity. When he was caught he was confined in a private asylum and every effort was made to keep the facts secret, but of course they leaked out and are pretty generally known, especially in Europe.

Stop on Soul Kisses

Because an officer of the law arrested two couples and their wives for giving a public exhibition of their osculatory prowess, he has been brought before the police commission for trial. It is a pretty point for the casuists. The arrested busses make the contention that California has no blue law to prohibit respectable married people from exchanging smacks on street corners. Also they repudiate with scorn the suggestion that their little kissing bee constituted a breach of public decorum. What more decorous, they ask, than the spectacle of a husband and wife testifying to the entente cordiale that obtains between them? But the cop draws a subtle distinction. He avers that he would not have objected to the common or garden variety of kisses, but that the arrested couples broke the peace by indulging in osculations of the soul variety. He testifies that some of these offending lip services lasted for one or two minutes. This gave the police commission pause. Does an inoffensive kiss become a menace to the public peace when it is long drawn out? Is the duration the determining factor in the misdemeanor? Must kissing go by stop-watch as well as by favor when it is done on the street? Must there be a referee to time the rounds? The commission has taken the matter under advisement. President Walter O'Connell will no doubt examine the literature of the subject. I refer him to that authoritative work, "The Kisses" of Secundus.

The Big Deal of Francis M. Smith

The recent acquisition by Francis M. Smith of Oakland of Frank C. Havens' holdings in the Realty Syndicate, the Oakland Traction and the Key Route constitutes one of the biggest financial deals consummated in California in many years. The negotiations were conducted so quietly that few knew of the impending coup until it had been perfected and even then Smith announced it with the brevity suited to a small deal rather than to a gigantic operation which will leave a permanent mark on the corporate and business life of Alameda County. It was a huge deal involving millions—but just how many millions has not been made public. It has given Smith absolute control of the three corporations and will enable him to execute plans which have been maturing in his brain for a very long time. These plans are of the utmost interest to the people of the bay counties.

What Smith Plans

Smith intends to develop the Key Route holding on the western waterfront of Alameda County where the company has recently received a franchise from the City of Oakland. Wharves, piers and slips of the most modern type are to be constructed and a deep water harbor, equal to any on the coast, is projected. Fully as great development will follow in the matter of the Key Route system. Smith wants to make the line the greatest of its kind in the West. The company has applied for several franchises which will enable it to establish new lines and extend those now existing. It is understood too that he will make extensive improvements in the Oakland Traction Company involving a further investment of several millions. Trackage will be extended, street work done, additional power houses built and rolling stock of the very latest type purchased. As for the Realty Syndicate, its new ten story Class A building representing an investment of close to $700,000, will, when completed, be one of the most imposing structures in Oakland. Through his control of the Syndicate Smith now owns some of the most beautiful acreage in Alameda County to which he will ultimately build car lines; thus opening it up for residential purposes.

The Worth of Smith

When a millionaire is found in the ranks of the active workers for civic betterment, he is entitled to high praise. The man of unlimited resources is always tempted, first to devote himself exclusively to luxury and enjoyment; and secondly, to seek those eminently safe investments which involve no worry and no personal exertion. But Francis M. Smith is not that kind of a millionaire. He desires that the community in which he dwells should share the increment of his money; hence he puts his wealth into those big projects which have been mentioned and which, while yielding rich return to the investor, add to the wealth of the community and to the prosperity and comfort of all its citizens. The recent deal by which Smith extended his influence was epochal in Alameda County. Through years to come its influence will be felt by thousands to whom the man Smith is a total stranger.

Mumm Seems to be the Word

I was present a few evenings ago at a small convivial gathering at which the talk turned largely on vintage wines. "What wine do you think has been used at the most banquets, dinners and social functions during the year?" asked one of the speakers. The answers varied but the majority of those present agreed that Mumm had taken the honors this year as in so many years during the past. I have no doubt that this is correct. Mumm is a very popular wine, but no less popular is the genial agent of Mumm in these parts, Mr. Edward M. Greenway. It is always difficult to say whether the inherent virtue of a wine or the popularity of its agent contributes more to its success and in the case of Mumm this is particularly difficult, for Mumm is a wine for royal taste and its dispenser is a man of winning personality. Some hosts there are who will not be satisfied with anything but the celebrated "cordon rouge." Among others Colonel Kirkpatrick of the Palace always serves Mumm at the banquets which he gives.

A Brilliant Lawyer

When Judge Carroll Cook made his exit from the bench the judiciary lost one of its ablest representatives and the bar received a notable accession. Carroll Cook is one of the ablest attorneys of this State. He is a man of great experience in all the branches of law. His triumphs have been won in admiralty practice, in the probate court, in all the varieties of civil litigation and especially in the criminal departments of justice. Of late he has devoted a great deal of attention to criminal practice, and has handled some very important cases. As a trial lawyer his success has been notable. Skilled in the subtle art of cross-examination, his power of evoking the truth from reluctant witnesses is almost clairvoyant. Suave and always courteous he never fails to make a favorable impression on the jury which he addresses with clearness and precision, the wool and warp of his arguments being sound reason and common sense. And when Carroll Cook tries a case it behooves the judge to preside with impartiality and with due regard to the laws of evidence, for there are few men at the bar more zealous for the rights of his client or more alert to detect the slightest departure from fundamental principles.

The Fireman's Fund

The fire of 1906 which devastated San Francisco tested insurance companies as never before or since in the history of the world. Out of that time of stress the Fireman's Fund emerged with a record which has never been equaled and which at the time was generally believed to be an impossibility, viz: The payment of $11,000,000 loss as the result of a single conflagration—actually paid within one year after the fire. Not only was this done, when at the beginning of 1906 the company's assets were only $7,232,552, but so ably were its affairs conducted and so well were its efforts received by the public—including innumerable fire sufferers—that it closed the year 1907 with assets amounting to $5,938,099, and a net surplus of $806,922 over capital and all liabilities. The good name of this reliable institution is now so widely known that not only are its fire policies in greater demand than ever before, but its marine insurance policies are gladly accepted in foreign ports. Since the San Francisco disaster the volume of this company's business has grown steadily. Immediately following the fire Fireman's Fund stock was worth less than nothing. Today it has a book value of about $250 per $100 of par value. Its resources on January 1, 1910, aggregated $7,431,402, while its liabilities on that date were, exclusive of capital, $3,916,545, and the policy-holders' surplus was $3,514,857. The increase of its business has been correspondingly upward since January 1. The Fireman's Fund in its long and useful career has paid $42,027,470 for losses, and has disbursed $4,191,000 in dividends. Losses are promptly adjusted and paid. Correspondence is solicited.

The National Brewing Company are completing arrangements for their own bottling plant which will be of the most modern kind. The machinery and equipment are now on the way from Milwaukee. This new addition to their already large plant will entail an expense of about $75,000 and when finished the National Brewery will be one of the best equipped on the coast.

"Leaders of Quality"

California Wines

The members of the Home Industry League are pushing home products with a vim not only at home but abroad. The label "Made in California" has taken on fresh fascination in the Eastern States. Our raisins, prunes, olives, olive oil and oranges now dominate the Eastern market. Hitherto the progress of California wines sistent efforts of the Cresta Blanca people. It is now to be had at such New York hotels as the St. Regis, Plaza, Waldorf-Astoria and Knickerbocker Hotels. What the managers of Cresta Blanca have done others can do, but they must put forth a good wine and sustain its reputation by quality or their efforts will be in vain. Even foreign countries are purchasing our best wines.

have been slow, a circumstance due to the fact that few of our good wines have been pushed in foreign parts. There are wines made in California that never should be shipped beyond the borders of the State, and unfortunately they are not fully lauded. Of late, however, our manufacturers of good wines are getting to the front in their products are to be had at many of the leading hotels and restaurants of the country. One brand of California especially has found much favor in the East. This is the Cresta Blanca, which is of course the best known of all California wines owing to the uniformity of its character and the long period in which it has been in the market. The success of this wine, however, is due in a great measure to the per-

A New Book Worth While

In "A Nation's Crime" which is the title of a new novel by Mrs. I. Lowenberg, one of the leaders in clubdom and society here, the author points out through the medium of the story which is rich in dramatic interest the absurdity of the present legal situation regarding the annulment and remaking of marriages.

In "The Irresistible Current" which Mrs. Lowenberg gave to literature over a year ago and which caused much comment, the author showed great facility of expression and more than literary technique.

"A Nation's Crime" is a story of absorbing interest, graphically depicting not only a possibility of the present haphazard laws which hold in one State and do not apply to another, but a probability so natural that it is startlingly like a record taken from actual life.

The miseries of the mother, whose Reno divorce is pronounced null and void nearly a lifetime after her marriage, the death of the daughter by suicide are all a part of this unhappy legal anomaly which works such hardships upon the innocent.

"I saw that man whom your articles describe so fiercely," said the reader.

Enid and Eleanor

So Miss Enid Gregg has been invited to aviate! 'Tis an interesting morsel of news. What a lucky fellow this Claude Grahame-White is, to have the prettiest and most charming girls of the country selected for him as his flying mates. Who would not be an aviator if he might mount the fleecy clouds and breast the air currents with Miss Gregg? If I might just once commune with the silent upper spaces in the company of Miss Gregg I would thereafter retire to my hangar and die in peace! It has been whispered now and then that both Eleanor Sears and Pauline Chase, the "Pink Pajama Girl," have cast their romantic spells over Claude. If these very fascinating young ladies are really heart-stirred by the attentions which they have received from the dashing birdman, they had better look out! Miss Gregg will prove a formidable rival. Claude would not be human or British if he could resist the charms of Enid. Miss Chase, I presume, does not know of the impending danger, for I suppose she has never had the pleasure of meeting Miss Gregg. But Miss Sears has met her many times. Miss Gregg's charms of person and mind had opened the way for her into the Blingum set when Miss Sears was entertained here and the two girls are acquainted. If Eleanor is really cherishing just a little regard for Claude, she is sure to feel a slight twinge of jealousy when she learns that Enid is going to challenge her supremacy as an aviatrix. I'll bet Claude will count it one of the pleasantest days of his life when he meets Miss Gregg. And I'll bet Miss Sears will be a little "peevish."

Mr. and Mrs. William H. Crocker will give a ball and supper at the Palace New Year's eve.

An Unselfish Debutante

Since the winter season was ushered in we have had an unusual number of brilliant balls, dinners and smart functions crowded into a very short space of time. The records of preceding seasons have been broken. Every entertainment seems to surpass its predecessor; everybody seems to go the hostess of the last affair one better. The brilliant dinner and dance of Mrs. William S. Tevis will be long remembered. While many of our hostesses spent as much money probably as did Mrs. Tevis, in some cases confusion reigned supreme. Success requires good judgment and rare tact. At one of the last and most brilliant balls given last week I heard much comment upon the hostess and her bevy of assistants for not introducing strangers and seeing that all the guests had dancing partners. Some of the most beautiful and attractive young girls dressed in the latest Parisian fashion were seen to deck the wall for two or three dances. At a ball given in a private house guests would feel at home and would address one another without an introduction, but in a large ball room at a public hotel naturally they feel the frigid atmosphere. Then again the cold and chilly treatment some of the girls give one another is appalling. Girls are loath to introduce a young man even to their most intimate friends. It is no uncommon scene to observe some of the most beautiful and stunning girls talking to young men and not introducing their girl friends who join them. In this connection I am reminded of a conversation I had with a well known matron of the smart set just after the Josselyn ball. She remarked that too much praise could not be bestowed upon Miss Ysobel Chase, that she possessed the savoir faire of the Mizners and that she was the most unselfish debutante noted this season. Her first thought is to introduce her young men friends to the girls. If she detects a friend without a partner before she begins to dance she sees to it that one is found. At a recent dance she dragged young men across the room in her hurry to procure partners for some of the prettiest girls who were being neglected.

On a Bachelor's Trail

Oakland's Mayor, Mr. Frank L. Mott, being a bachelor and also a millionaire is the object of much angling in social circles across the bay. He is on the list of many fond mammas; and for the snaring of him all the subtle wiles of the ingenious female of our species are being practiced with unrelenting assiduity. The bavardes of the press being aware of the situation and realizing the impossibility of the Mayor's evading the inevitable are keeping their eye on him, resolved to sense the story of his engagement the moment he capitulates to Cupid. The result is that Mayor Mott suffers a good deal of embarrassment. He cannot talk to a woman without exciting the curiosity of the press. On the slightest provocation the newspapers hint at an engagement. Whenever he is seen with an attractive maiden the machinery of the newspaper inquisition is set in motion. This persistent policy of meddlesomeness led to a curious contretemps the other evening at a Berkeley home where Mr. Mott was paying a social visit. The tip having been out for some time that the millionaire bachelor has been taking a deep interest in a Berkeley family, the reporter of a San Francisco daily was sent to the college town to hunt down the rumor of an engagement. His inquiries led him to the home where Mr. Mott was enjoying relaxation from his social labors. asked if any announcement of an engagement was to be made, and the Mayor went to the door to make reply. It is said that he waxed exceedingly wroth, and threatened to have the reporter arrested. The reporter went away convinced that the Mayor's news sense was imperfectly developed.

The Charming Miss Elkins

San Francisco society is particularly charmed with Miss Mary Louise Elkins. Her graceful manner, her winning smile and her beauty are noted wherever she appears. She made a pre-picture at the St. Francis concert on Tuesday evening as she sat in the box with the Misses C and Frederica Otis. Many who did not recognize who the beautiful brunette with large expressive eyes was, were inquiring her name. Sena Charles N. Felton, her grandfather, was a handsome man in his day, and time has dealt leniently with him. Mrs. Elkins, before her marriage, was Miss Katherine Felton, a member of the young exclusive set twenty-five years ago. After marriage to the rich Philadelphian she resided in the East. Mr. Elkins has been dead a number of years. His father had accumulated millions and to each of his grandchildren he left about a million apiece. The W. B. celite convent in the south of England reminds me that San Francisco has given a number of well known society girls to the religious life. Miss Ada Sullivan, the daughter of Frank J. Sullivan, was the first postulant of the Carmelites after they established a convent in this city and was on her account that Frank Sullivan bought the old Stevenson home on Russian Hill for the order. Following the example of Miss Sullivan who was her dearest friend Miss Peyton also became a nun. Miss Nellie Deming a few years ago joined the order of the Madames of the Sacred Heart. Miss Pauline Ivancovich became sister of the Holy Family. Not very long ago Miss Edith Tormey joined the Ursulines in whose college at Santa Rosa she had been educated. And there are others who have turned their back on brilliant social careers to follow the example of George Moore's greatest heroine.

Will Mrs. Keppel Come Here?

From a London paper I learn that Mrs. George Keppel, known the world over as the chum of the late King Edward, departed some time ago on a yachting tour of the world in company with the Baroness de Brien. This is interesting. A tour of the world is just as likely as not to include a visit to this city and while I know nothing about Mrs. Keppel's route of travel, I would not be surprised if her steam yacht cast anchor in the bay one of these fine days. What a commotion that would cause! Everybody in town would want to get a look at the celebrated woman who ruled the royal circle by her personal charms. Would society receive her with open arms? I am sure it would. I haven't the least doubt that it would deluge her with invitations. But would Mrs. Keppel receive society? Ah! that is another question. A woman who has dictated to the gayest set in the world might not be impressed with our provincial aristocracy. The thought makes one shudder. Really, if Mrs. Keppel comes here, there is likely to be a social clairssement the like of which we have never known. But then of course she may not come.

The Decline of Dress in England

Those among us who are wont to lament the carelessness of American men in the matter of dress may take heart from the knowledge that matters are apparently not much better in England. In evidence I offer a letter which appeared recently in "The Times." Making all sorts of allowance for the pessimism which is usually the strongest characteristic of the Britisher who writes letters to his favorite paper, there is still sufficient truth in the following indictment to make Americans easier in their minds: "Sir—

In the early spring of this year I returned to England after an absence of some ten years, and I have been much struck by the untidy and slack appearance presented by men in their dress. May I ask if this is a sign of the times? I am old enough to feel somewhat shocked at the change which is apparent on all sides—not only in the evening but during the day. I frequently went to Hyde Park during the past season, and noticed all kinds of incongruities in men's dress. When I was a young man the correct attire for a gentleman—I use the word advisedly—consisted of a silk hat, frock or morning coat, well-cut and pressed trousers, light gloves, a smart tie of some light shade in the summer, and either well-blackened or varnished boots. What did I see this summer? Very few well-dressed men at all. There were any number to be seen wearing flash suits with trousers turned up displaying a large amount of gaudy socks, a Panama hat worn at the back of the head, or maybe a weird-shaped felt hat of sporting appearance. In nine cases out of ten it seemed to be the fashion to wear a tie to match the socks. Shade of Beau Brummel! And to complete this attire yellow wash-leather gloves were worn. May I ask what would have been thought of such costumes a few years ago? I do not stop at this. I am complaining of the appearance presented by men—men who ought to know better—at the theater and opera. I have always understood that dinner jackets, however comfortable and suitable they may be for the privacy of the smoking-room or a quiet family dinner, were decidedly out of place at the theater or restaurant, and yet, to my amazement, I noticed at least one-third of the men at Covent Garden the other night wearing these garments, with black ties and fancy waistcoats. Turn-down collars with black ties and even colored waistcoats were to be seen, and I noticed one individual wearing blacked boots with brown uppers! One would have thought it quite unnecessary to point out that evening dress consists of a swallow-tailed coat, white or black waistcoat, trousers of the same material as the coat, a white tie, white kid gloves, and patent-leather Oxford shoes. "Old School."

Betty Ashe Goes East

Miss Betty Ashe who has so long been at the head of the Telegraph Hill Settlement at North Beach has resigned and intends to leave for the East in the very near future. Miss Ashe is a sister of R. Porter Ashe, Sidney and Gaston, and of Mrs. Norman McLaren of this city and Mrs. Harrold Sewell of Maine. Miss Myrtle Rose who recently graduated from Bellevue Hospital in New York City arrived the other day and will take Miss Ashe's place. Miss Rose is a step-sister of Mrs. William High of Oakland and thoroughly competent to assume control.

The Smallest Dog

A few days before Lillian Russell left this city she was seen in an art store carrying what she declared to be the smallest Japanese spaniel in the world. She bought it of Thomas H. Stevenson, the florist, for one thousand dollars. As she left the store she put her pet doggie in her coat pocket. This will bring forth much discussion in the smart set, as Mrs. Francis J. Carolan has long claimed to own the very smallest dog in the world, a "toy terrier" which has often been photographed in her arms. It was Mrs. Carolan's habit when she made a short journey to leave her dog in the care of a responsible veterinary. As the Carolans are now in Paris the dog no doubt is with them. Late letters from New York report Miss Innes Keeney appearing in handsome furs and huge muff with a tiny Pommeranian perched upon her muff. She too claims that her canine is the smallest in the world. So here we have three claimants. Madame Tetrassini has a mite of a dog and doubtless makes the same claim. Which of these is correct?

An Editor Marries

Charles Phillips, editor of "The Monitor," was married December 21, at Dawson, Nebraska, to Miss Catherine Loughran of Washington, D. C. The ceremony was performed in St. Mary's Church, Dawson, by the pastor, Rev. J. J. Loughran, a cousin of the bride. The bride is a daughter of Hon. Joseph Loughran, Chief Examiner of the Board of Review, Bureau of U. S. Pensions, who, as an officer of the regular army, now retired, won distinction for bravery on the old Santa Fe trail during the Civil War. He was associated with Kit Carson in the early days of the Southwest. Miss Loughran has been prominent in Catholic circles in the national capital, and has a brother in the Jesuit Order. For a time she enjoyed a successful career on the stage, but retired over a year ago. In the leading comedy role with Maclyn Arbuckle in "The County Chairman" she made a hit in the large eastern cities, and during her short career appeared with a number of famous players, among them Clara Morris, Charlotte Walker, Julia Herne, Laura Nelson Hall, Dorothy Hammond, John Mason, Guy Standing, Edwin Arden, Maude Fealey and Bertha Galland. She has devoted much of her talent to church work. Madame Modjeska was greatly interested in Miss Loughran's career, and it is said that the great tragedienne had something to do with "making the match" which resulted in the wedding.

form her housewarming will take. The new Hart home has been in process of construction for two years and a half and during that time the Harts have made their dwelling in a smaller house connected with their new mansion by a beautiful pergola. The furniture for the new home has been carefully selected in the art shops of Rome, Paris, London and New York and will be installed within the next six weeks. The Harts will welcome their friends to the completed dwelling. The Harts have always entertained extensively, for Mrs. Hart possesses a talent for social life, but their friends are confident that in their new home they will release all their former efforts. Naturally society is waiting with impatience for the good time to come.

The Death of the Dauphin

By Alphonse Daudet

The little Dauphin is ill; the little Dauphin is dying. In all the churches of the kingdom the Holy Sacrament remains exposed night and day, and great tapers burn, for the recovery of the royal child. The streets of the old capital are sad and silent, the bells ring no more, the carriages slacken their pace. In the neighborhood of the palace the curious towns-people gaze through the railings upon the beadles with gilded paunches, who converse in the courts and put on important airs.

All the castle is in a flutter. Chamberlains and major-domos run up and down the marble stairways. The galleries are full of pages and of courtiers in silken apparel, who hurry from one group to another, begging in low tones for news. Upon the wide perrons the maids of honor, in tears, exchange low courtesies and wipe their eyes with daintily embroidered handkerchiefs.

A large assemblage of robed physicians has gathered in the Orangery. They can be seen through the panes waving their long black sleeves and inclining their periwigs with professional gestures. The governor and the equerry of the little Dauphin walk up and down before the door awaiting the decision of the Faculty. Scullions pass by without saluting them. The equerry swears like a pagan; the governor quotes verses from Horace.

And meanwhile, over there, in the direction of the stables, is heard a long and plaintive neighing; it is the little Dauphin's sorrel, forgotten by the hostlers, and calling sadly before his empty manger.

And the King? Where is his Highness the King? The King has locked himself up in a room at the other end of the castle. Majesties do not like to be seen weeping. For the Queen it is different. Sitting by the bedside of the little Dauphin, she bows her fair face, bathed in tears, and sobs very loudly before everybody, like a mere draper's wife.

On the bed embroidered with lace the little Dauphin, whiter than the pillows on which he is extended, lies with closed eyes. They think that he is asleep; but no, the little Dauphin is not asleep. He turns towards his mother, and seeing her tears, he asks:

"Madame la Reine, why do you weep? Do you really believe that I am going to die?"

The Queen tries to answer. Sobs prevent her from speaking.

"Do not weep, Madame la Reine. You forget that I am the Dauphin, and that Dauphins cannot die thus."

The Queen sobs more violently, and the little Dauphin begins to feel frightened.

"Holloa!" says he, "I do not want Death to come and take me away, and I know how to prevent him from coming here. Order up on the spot forty of the strongest lansquenets to keep guard around our bed! Have a hundred big cannons watch day and night, with lighted fires, under our windows! And woe to Death if he dares to come near us!"

In order to humor the royal child, the Queen makes a sign. On the spot the great cannons are heard rolling in the courts, and forty tall lansquenets, with halberds in their fists, draw up around the room. They are all veterans, with grizzly mustaches. The little Dauphin claps his hands on seeing them. He recognizes one, and calls:

"Lorrain! Lorrain!"

The veteran makes a step towards the bed.

"I love you well, my old Lorrain. Let me see your big sword. If Death wants to fetch me, you will kill him, won't you?"

Lorrain answers: "Yes, Monseigneur."

At that moment the chaplain approaches the little Dauphin, and pointing to the crucifix, talks to him in low tones. The little Dauphin listens with astonished air; then, suddenly interrupting him:

"I understand well what you are saying, Monsieur l'Abbe; but still, couldn't my little friend Beppo die in my place, if I gave him plenty of money?"

The chaplain continues to talk to him in low tones, and the little Dauphin looks more and more astonished.

When the chaplain has finished, the little Dauphin resumes, with a heavy sigh:

"What you have said is all very sad, Monsieur l'Abbe; but one thing consoles me, and that is that up there, in the Paradise of the stars, I shall still be the Dauphin. I know that the good God is my cousin, and cannot fail to treat me accordingly to my rank."

Then he adds, turning towards his mother:

"Bring me my finest clothes, my doublet of white ermine, and my pumps of velvet! I wish to look brave to the angels, and to enter Paradise in the dress of a Dauphin."

A third time the chaplain bends over the little Dauphin, and talks to him in low tones. In the midst of his discourse the royal child interrupts him angrily.

The favorite pencil with those who know is the "KOH-I-NOOR." Beware of imitations. The genuine is the world's best pencil.—H. S. Crocker, 460 Market St., San Francisco.

"Why, then," he cries, "to be Dauphin is nothing at all!"

And refusing to listen to anything more, the little Dauphin turns towards the wall and weeps bitterly.

A Play by a Dramatic Critic

By Edward F. O'Day

Political justice would seem to require that the dramatic critic writes a play, it should be criticised by an actor. Speaking generally, it may be said that the dramatic critic is the thorn on the side of the actor. It is the dramatic critic who plucks the crumpled rose petal into the actor's pathetic couch for the disturbance of his slumbers. He is the skeleton at the theatrical feast, rattling and creaking his bony joints to remind the actor of the imminence of critical examination. It follows that when the dramatic critic forsakes his professional function to try his hand at play writing, his victim should be allowed to associate as appraiser of his effort. But alas! this is not a world of exact justice and there is no balance which gives the actor the right to judgment upon the dramatic critic's play. The actor must look to the dramatic critic's fellow-workmen to administer vicarious chastisement. Getting down to particulars, Al. C. Joy, the dramatic critic of the Examiner, has written a play. It was produced last week at Harry Bishop's beautiful Ye Liberty Playhouse in Oakland. I made the long journey to Oakland for the purpose of witnessing this production. Perhaps I cherished a secret idea that I might win the dying gratitude of the theatrical profession for that part of it, anyway, which harbors unkindly feelings toward Joy—by pounding this play to pieces on a critical typewriter. But if I had any such idea—and I am not committing myself—it ran foul of two serious obstacles. In the first place I cannot recall any actor, I cannot recall any actorine, who has the right to the mill of Al. Joy. In Al. Joy the quality of mercy is unstrained. He has a kind word for all the actors, for the good because they are good and for the bad because they are not worse than they are. If a play or an actor is "so middling that bad were better," Al. Joy never finds it necessary to harp upon its mediocrity. He is so addicted to praising that even when he damns he damns with faint praise. So the actors have reason to like Al. Joy and I would hardly win their favor by roasting him. But there is another obstacle. Al. Joy's play cannot be pounded to pieces. It is a play strong enough to resist pounding. "Happie of the Chorus" is the name of it and it is correctly described as a farce-comedy with music. The music was written by Lionel Dalton who, like Joy himself, is a Fresno man. Mr. Dalton makes very pretty tunes and they are so fitted to the play as to lend it a heightened interest. From first to last "Happie of the Chorus" is a mighty interesting production. It concerns a newlywed physician with a wife who is the soul of love and trust, and a mother-in-law who lives up to the best traditions of the stage. The doctor also has a very pretty sister-in-law, the beloved of the doctor's best friend, a young man who thinks he possesses the hypnotic power but is mistaken. These interesting people are gathered in the doctor's apartments when Happie makes her appearance. Happie is a chorus girl who had carried on flirtations with both of the young men when they were sowing their wild oats at college. She comes ostensibly to blackmail the newlywed and is followed by her "swell gentleman friend," also connected with the stage. The coming of these two precipitates the series of complications which make the fun of the play. For three acts the fun is fast and furious. There are several farcical situations which are distinctly new and which approve themselves by setting the house in a roar. It would be untrue to say that the play is a finished product; no play is during its first presentation. But the weak spots are of the sort that can be easily fortified and then "Happie of the Chorus" will be a mighty good farce-comedy indeed. The Ye Liberty players show their usual felicity. Ye Liberty is the Alcazar of Oakland and its players are carefully selected. Mr. Sydney Ayres and Miss Muriel Hope who are the leading members of the company, play respectively the young physician and the chorus girl. They play them well. The leading man and the leading woman of a stock company always find farce-comedy their most difficult milieu; and when they "get away with it" as Mr. Ayres and Miss Hope do, they are deserving of great credit. George Friend, James Gleason and Miss Maribel Seymour are entitled to particular credit for the unlabored vivacity of their comedy. That capable veteran George Webster has a small part and plays it as George Webster might be expected to play it. The rest of the company, Miss Catharine Calhoun, Miss Ramona Radcliffe and Mrs. Mina Gleason acquit themselves to the general satisfaction. Joy should be glad that his play is so well acted and so elaborately mounted and Harry Bishop should be glad that he got hold of so good a play. This being the season of gladness, I may as well express my pleasure in Joy's success. May he keep it up!

SCENE FROM "THE BEAUTY SPOT" IN WHICH JEFFERSON DE ANGELIS WILL STAR AT THE SAVOY THEATER THIS CHRISTMAS WEEK

Stage

"The Merry Widow and the Devil"

"The Merry Widow and the Devil" has run merrily on at the Garrick and, judging by the impression already made, is proving the most profitable of the Dill offerings thus far presented. Bright and witty and tuneful, this ingenious travesty makes for true musical comedy entertainment. Dill is a scream as the valet-janitor. The part fits him and he gets all manner of fun out of it. He is unctuously, delightfully entertaining. The burlesque of the Merry Widow waltz, which he does with Roger Gray, the Devil, is one of the funniest conceptions to his credit. Maude Lillian Berri is again the vivacious airy widow. The delightful musical numbers that fall to her lot are charmingly handled and she makes a rare picture in the beautiful costumes that the part demands. Prince Dandilo, as Percy Bronson plays him, is debonair and dashing. It is easily the best thing Bronson has done, and he gives an even more convincing portrayal of the part this season than he did last. Roger Gray is properly crafty as the Devil. Eva Pollard is a delightful little Mimi. Maurice Darcy does some clever work as Baron Kaufman. Laura Oakley as Elsie Iceberg contributes some excellent character work. It is generally admitted that "The Merry Widow and the Devil" establishes high-water mark for elaborateness of production at the Garrick. The chorus is naturally a great feature, the Farsavian dance, executed at the opening of the second act, being one of the most entertaining bits of the evening. All of the original "Merry Widow" music by Franz Lehar is played in Dill's production. An augmented orchestra under Frank Paret interprets the haunting melodies in fine fashion. Commencing with the matinee tomorrow, Sunday, Dill will revive "Playing the Ponies." Lora Lieb who has been taking a vacation, will return for this piece. She will have the prima donna role.

—The Second Nighter.

Broadway Success at the Columbia

Beginning December 26, Charles Frohman's big musical production, "The Dollar Princess" will begin a limited engagement at the Columbia, and theatergoers of this city will have an opportunity of seeing for the first time this wonderful New York success, which ran for over fourteen months at the Knickerbocker Theater. "The Dollar Princess" differs from the ordinary musical comedy in the fact that it possesses a consistent plot. The story was written by Messrs. Willner and Grunbaum. Leo Fall, the Austrian composer, has furnished a score that is said to be as tuneful as that of "The Merry Widow." In fact, his countrymen class him as an equal of Franz Lehar, the composer of the latter music. Like his production of "The Arcadians," Mr. Frohman has spared neither expense nor pains in making "The Dollar Princess" complete in every detail and the result is a most gorgeous production.

The Orpheum Road Show

The Orpheum Road Show, a great theatrical event every year, will open on this Sunday matinee at the Orpheum. As usual it is under the direction of Mr. Martin Beck who this season has, if possible, surpassed all his previous efforts, the result being a program which includes a number of the most famous artists in the old and new world. The twin brothers, Rigoletto, Charles and Henry, have created the biggest kind of a sensation. Their performance baffles description—to be thoroughly appreciated it must be witnessed. It is divided into eight parts. They excel as instrumentalists, as jugglers, as Chinese magicians, as mimics, as illusionists, in plastic poses, and acrobats and as aerial gymnasts. The bewitching "La Pia," appropriately styled "The Enchantress," comes direct from the Palace Theater, London, where she created a furore. The coming program will be the means of introducing her to American audiences. As a fantastic dancer "La Pia," who is a girl of extraordinary beauty of face and figure, is unexcelled. She appears in four varied dances, each with elaborate scenery, the effect of which is enhanced by electric and cinematographic effects. Her best effort is her final dance. The stage seems transformed into a raging sea and the breakers roll thunderingly against the shore. In the midst of the waves "La Pia" suddenly appears stricken with terror and endeavoring to fight her way to safety. She is tossed to and fro by the waves and finally swallowed up by the angry sea. Howard, Scotland's premier ventriloquist and the most famous of his line in Europe, will be another new comer. Like most of his countrymen he is gifted with a keen sense of humor. Mr. Melville and Robert Higgins, eccentric singers and chattering comedians, will indulge in a new skit called "Just a Little Fun." Their great popularity in this city will ensure them a cordial welcome. Charles Leonard Fletcher supported by Louise Christie, William Stafford, Lew Gordon, Malcolm Blevins and Thomas Boyd will be seen in a comedy of absorbing interest entitled "His Nerve" which was originally produced with great success at a Lambs' Club Gambol. The Quigley Brothers, original singing and dancing comedians of national reputation, Wellington Cross and Lois Josephine, a talented couple in clever and amusing skit called "Dying to Admire," and Joe Jackson, "the European Vagabond," will complete a program which reaches the highest standard of vaudeville.

Evelyn Vaughan and Bertram Lytell Return

Evelyn Vaughan and Bertram Lytell will return to the Alcazar Theater next Monday afternoon in a splendid pictorial production of

BERTRAM LYTELL AT THE ALCARZAR THEATER

"The Beauty Spot" at the Savoy

The last performance of Henry W. Savage's "Madame X" will take place at the Savoy this Saturday afternoon and evening and on Sunday evening F. Ray Comstock will present that favorite comedian, Jefferson De Angelis, in the De Koven and Herbert musical comedy success, "The Beauty Spot," for an engagement limited to eight nights, with a special Christmas matinee Monday. During the seven months' run of the piece at the Herald Square Theater, New York, it was noted for its artistic scenery, brilliant light effects and rich costumes. Mr. De Angelis resumes his tour in "The Beauty Spot" after an interruption which was caused his engagement to head the all-star cast of "The Mikado" at the Casino during the summer months. "The Beauty Spot" cast includes such well-known artists as George J. MacFarlane, Viola Gillette, Florence Martin, Joseph Fay, Charles W. Meyer, Inez Dean, Arvid Paulson, Ida Vantine and sixty others.

Mme. Gerville-Reache

The next great singer to appear under the Greenbaum direction will be Mme. Gerville-Reache, the French contralto who shared honors with Tetrassini, Mary Garden and Bonci at the Manhattan Opera House under the Hammerstein regime. This artist is said to possess the finest contralto voice of modern times, more like Scalchi's than any singer we have heard since that wonderful artist appeared here with Patti. Mme. Gerville-Reache has been engaged for a special concert before the State Teachers' In-

MARIBEL SEYMOUR

A popular member of the Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland.

"Brewster's Millions," which will be the attraction throughout the week. This tremendously popular couple are booked for a limited season only, and the popular interest in their reappearance is not diminished by the fact that since they left the Alcazar they have been united in wedlock. That they will receive a rousing reception goes without saying, for no Alcazarans ever caught and retained public favor as they have. It was while serving as leading players at the Alcazar that they formed the attachment that eventually led to their wedding, which took place in August in the East. "Brewster's Millions" will afford the entire company an exceptional opportunity to do meritorious individual and collective work. It will be the play's first presentation by a stock organization, and Belasco & Meyer have paid an unusually heavy sum for the privilege of producing it.

The Tetrassini Farewell

The farewell Tetrassini concert will be given Friday afternoon, December 26, at Dreamland. As being a legal holiday, many people will have an opportunity to attend who have been unable on account of the Christmas business rush to hear this artist at her previous concerts and many mail orders are being received from distant points in the interior. The program will be a most attractive one and will show how a "Mad Scene" is interpreted in melody by both the French and Italian schools, for Tetrassini has announced that she will sing the "Mad Scene" from Ambroise Thomas' operatic setting of "Hamlet" as well as the "Mad Scene" from Bizet's "Lucia." By special request the diva will also sing the "Shadow Dance" from Meyerbeer's opera "Dinorah" with which she created such a furore during the Tivoli season.

A SWEET NEW YEAR'S ACKNOWLEDGMENT

Interplanetary Love

By Enrique Labarta

Far away in the mysterious depths of space, not far from the Polar Star and on the right hand as you ascend, there revolves about the sun a modest planet on which life is subject to the same conditions as on the one that we sometimes complain of having to inhabit. Man is mortal there, as here, and is born but to die, but he has reached a much more advanced stage of progress for the simple reason that his planet is older than ours. Children are born there with a degree of Bachelor of Arts and many of them come Doctors in Science before they have laid aside their childish toys.

The thoughtful ones of that far-away world have succeeded in wresting from nature all her secrets, so that now nothing remains concealed from them. They have, moreover, the sense of sight so wonderfully developed, that, without any extraordinary effort, simply by partially closing their eyes, they can distinguish a horse from a cow on the nearest planet, a matter of sixteen million leagues away. This being the case I need not tell you how far they can see with their most powerful telescopes.

For this reason they have mastered more thoroughly than any other people the science of astronomy.

The life, character and behavior of the surrounding planets within a radius of a thousand million leagues is for them an open book; but, since there is an infinite number of worlds and stars revolving in space, they have not yet had time to examine them all in detail.

At the historical moment in which this most truthful story begins, in one of the best astronomical observatories of that distant world, was an eminent scientist, a young man about twenty years of age and of a fine appearance, whose favorite diversion was to travel amongst the stars by means of an enormous telescope. While ranging about idly through stars and planets, suddenly he became all attention and brought his instrument to a standstill. He had just discovered, many thousand millions of leagues away, a small planet very much like his own—the same seas, the same continents and the same contents. It was the earth.

After letting his glance wander over the five divisions of our globe, from the head to the tail, or rather from the North Pole to the South, he focused the telescope upon the main promenade of a small Spanish city.

It was Sunday in our planet and at that moment many of the towns-people were walking up and down the promenade, enjoying the fresh air and listening to the music furnished by the municipal band.

It was a curious sight for the young astronomer to see these people, extravagantly dressed, walking up and down between the two rows of shade-trees, turning about and retracing their steps as soon as they reached either end of the promenade. Contemplating for the first time unknown but kindred human beings, whose images, silent as specters, came to the retina of his eye through the solitude of infinite space from a planet separated from his own by thousands of millions of leagues, he was deeply moved. Thanks to the lenses of his telescope, he had often visited many other worlds, but since they were inhabited by beings quite unlike those of his own planet, none of them interested him so much as the one he had just discovered.

Suddenly his eye fell upon the extraordinary beauty of a young girl seated on one of the chairs at the side of the promenade and his heart swelled with rapture. Tall, graceful, of irrepachable figure that magnificent brunette was no sooner seen than loved. Through the intervening nine thousand billion leagues or so the winged arrow of love came flying and lodged itself in the susceptible heart of the young astronomer. He fell hopelessly in love with that beautiful young girl of this planet so far removed from his own.

Fascinated, he kept his gaze on her all that afternoon, accompanied her to her home and, spying upon her with his telescope, waited in vain for her to come again into the street or appear at a window; until at last, the Earth in its revolving motion concealing the hemisphere in which she lived, he had to give up the hope of seeing her again until the morrow.

From that day on our young scientist lost all repose and sleep, and, leaving his friends and relatives, transferred his lodgings to the observatory.

Every night, nervous and trembling with excitement, he kept gazing through his telescope, waiting for his adored one to appear at the balcony or go out to the public promenade. After three days of constant observation he discovered to his sorrow that his distant idol had another and more fortunate lover, who haunted the street in which she lived and by means of signs from a porch opposite was apparently coming to an understanding with her.

Furious jealousy added fuel to the flame of his love. He was at first tempted to hurl his telescope at the head of his favored rival, but second thoughts showed him the futility of this. A somewhat complicated mathematical calculation convinced him that even though he should take true aim at his rival's head and hurl the telescope with the whole strength of his soul, it would take one million seven hundred and twenty-one thousand six hundred and thirty-one years for it to reach its destination! At the end of that time neither the girl nor her lover would be living and perhaps even the planet they dwelt on would be no more.

Sad and desperate, our young scientist spent his time near his telescope and whenever the revolving motion of the Earth permitted him to do so, gazed incessantly at the house of that beautiful woman who, nine thousand billion leagues away, was receiving the attentions of his favored rival. Had she been aware of the impossible love that she had inspired in the unknown inhabitant of another planet, perhaps from time to time she would have sent a glance of pity towards the distant star.

The friends and colleagues of the astronomer wondered much at his sudden change of character. Instead of the lively and light-hearted young man they formerly knew he had become diffident and taciturn. They wanted to find out the cause of it, but it was useless for them to question him about the mysterious trouble that was gradually consuming his life.

At last, unable to endure any longer in silence the hidden grief that was gnawing at his heart, he decided to tell his secret to another astronomer, his most intimate friend, for sorrows shared with another, if they are not healed, are at least rendered more endurable.

His friend listened to his story in open-mouthed wonder and, as soon as he had heard the end of it, exclaimed:

"That is a strange case, upon my word!"

"Strange, indeed!" answered the enamored one, brushing away his tears.

"If you love her so much, why do you not send her a formal declaration of love accompanied by your photograph?"

"But how?"

"In a ray of light, of course."

"I have already thought of that, but it is impossible. I am very much afraid they are not acquainted with that means of communication on the Earth, and even though they were, to reach its destination, my telegram of love would require some fifty years."

"You are right. How slow light is compared to thought! The best it can do is three hundred thousand kilometers a second. This being the case, then, you can do nothing by letter. Besides, it is much better to handle such matters personally."

"But how can I manage to go in person? Even were I to undertake the journey in a vehicle that traveled at the uncommon speed of six thousand kilometers a minute it would take me one hundred and fifty thousand years to reach her planet. I need not say that I should be dead of old age at the first stage of the journey. This is terrible!"

"Ah!" suddenly exclaimed the other astronomer, slapping his forehead. "What fools we are not to have thought of it sooner! Why, you stupid fellow, you are in love with a phantom! That woman does not exist!"

"Does not exist?"

"At least, if she does, she is already an old man and not worth while thinking about."

"In heaven's name, explain yourself, man! My head is in such a whirl that I don't understand you."

"Well, then, given the great distance that lies between our planet and hers, light, at the rate of three hundred kilometers a second, takes exactly fifty years to come from there to us. That is, therefore, the time required for you to receive upon the retina of your eye the image of your loved one; so that, at the present moment, you see her as she was half a century ago. How do you take her to be?"

"Twenty years, or thereabouts."

"Well, then, she is now, if she is still living, twenty years old. You are in love with a toothless old woman, or else with a corpse, for she has already have died."

"Heaven have pity on me! You are right; I hadn't thought of that."

"Suppose that you could transport yourself to that planet in an instant, with the rapidity of thought. It would still avail you nothing. Instead of the young woman you adore, you would find nothing but a mere phantom, living or dead." With livid countenance and bewildered brain the poor young astronomer listened to the rational and scientific explanation of his colleague. When the blood rushed violently to his head and he fell to the ground like one struck by lightning. His friend approached and touched him; he was cold. He put his hand to his heart; it was not beating. Life was already extinct.

Poor astronomer! Science, showing him prosaic reality in all its nakedness, had deprived him of life. For many months he had endured the keen torment of a hopeless love; but he could not survive for a single instant the crumbling and disintegration of his ideal.

If there is any sceptical reader who doubts the veracity of this story, there is still time for him to verify it; for he still has fifty years ahead of him in which to invent an apparatus by which he may be able to see the planet in which this little drama took place and this planet is to be found, as I said in the beginning, not far from the Polar Star, on the right hand as you ascend.

Yes, within half a century you can witness his tragic death, within half a century, I say, the time required by light to bring to us his pale image. In the meantime, suspend your judgment and, personally at least, believe what I have told you.

The Angels

By Theodore De Bannville

Greater and taller than our minds can figure them, through the immense ether where swarm the Infinites, and where the groups of worlds seem but specks of a vague dust, three silent Angels, intrusted with important messages, hasten their vertiginous flight. They are mounted on white horses of light, and clad in armor of scarlet diamond, to fight, if necessary, the monsters and hydras. They rush forward, causing the comets to flee, striking the frightened constellations, and, as they pass, brushing aside with their imperious fingers the manes of the suns. They are Malushiel of the fiery locks, who was the teacher of the prophet Elijah; Saraiel, the Shield of God; and Metator, the greatest of the Cherubim, he whose dazzling white beard floats to his knees; and in their midst rides the young angel Uriel. While his horse is at full gallop the child Angel, clutching his mane and bending down, picks up on the road an insignificant little ball, and in sport is about to fling it, with his yet feeble hands, over millions of Infinites; but the wise Metator arrests his arm.

"Drop it," he says.

"Ah!" says Uriel, lifting his innocent eyes, which mirror the deep skies, "is it of any use, this little ball?"

"No," answers the Messenger, "it is not of much use, but drop it, nevertheless. It is the Earth!"

Guest—Look here; how long am I going to have to wait for that half portion of duck I ordered?

Waiter—Till somebody orders the other half. We can't go out and kill half a duck.

California Literature of 1910

By Sarah Connell

The local world of letters during the year 1910 proved to be an exceptionally quiet one. Few books of more than passing interest were produced by Californian authors and no new literary lights loomed up on the horizon. In accordance with the accepted custom, early in the year it was announced that different members of the smart social set would forego the pleasures of cotillion and pink tea to devote their time to the production of masterpieces, but no one takes such declarations seriously, least of all those most nearly concerned. It takes a very few hours of concentrated application to convince the most sanguine that preparing a class room essay and producing marketable literature are by no means one and the same thing. One volume of poems by Miss Von Schroeder, with illustrations by Miss Foster, is to be recorded but even this was more of a social than a literary event. Society, from its ragged edge to its solid center, was in a state of agitation for a week or two over the definite announcement that Mrs. Darling was compiling her Memoirs with the deliberate intention of opening back doors, tearing down drawing room curtains and airing the attics and basements of the social structure, and almost immediately afterward there was resurrection of the perennial rumor that Edward Greenway was in negotiation with a publisher, but as yet nothing has happened. Mrs. Darling is both able and well informed, and should she decide on such a project, there is no doubt whatever that her reminiscences would head the list of best-sellers.

A year in California during which no announcement of a new literary colony was made would be indeed celery without salt. Since the gathering together of that group of artists and writers at Carmel-by-the-Sea, it has been successively given forth that various millionaire land owners have taken steps to plant a crop of letters and that Joaquin Miller, Jack London and every other writer with more of a holding than a city back yard was ready to built cottages and give away plots on the sole condition that brother pen men would accept. This time it was Mrs. R. L. Stevenson who was to have gathered a coterie about her in Santa Barbara. Gertrude Atherton who spent a good portion of the year in the State, enlivened matters in the early summer by her sharp criticism of the literary colony idea, which, in her estimation, is more likely to lead to waste of time in mutual admiration than to serious occupation. Naturally the colonists were resentful of her attitude and for a while the pages of the newspapers were made the battleground. The Carmel Colony gave an open air production of the drama "David," but it seems to have been more of a social than a dramatic or literary success.

The defunct graft prosecution which dragged its slow length along through the courts was the theme of several fictional attempts none of which attracted more than a passing glance. It was likewise the excuse for a procession of magazine articles, every man or woman who was even remotely connected with the affair seeming to recognize the opportunity for breaking into print. The novel-with-a-purpose has to be a good story apart from the purpose in order to survive the sensational moment, and the graft fiction was forgotten as rapidly as the earthquake poetry, which disappeared even more quickly than the ruins.

Miss Tobin's series of lectures on the Celtic Renaissance was decidedly the most important event of its kind during the year.

Jack London has to his credit five new books, though three of them being collections of short stories which had appeared in weekly and monthly periodicals, are not strictly new work. "Revolution" is a collection of essays, chiefly socialistic, and "Lost Face" and "When God Laughs" short stories. "Burning Daylight," his novel, with the scene partly in the gold fields of Alaska and partly in and around San Francisco, is one of the books of the year. The fifth volume is in dramatic form, "Theft."

Gertrude Atherton's contribution, decidedly her best piece of fiction up to date, was her novel, "Tower of Ivory." She, too, has turned her attention to drama, and her first play, written for Mrs. Fiske, is now in preparation for stage production. Geraldine Bonner, who has already tried her hand on stage work, added another to her pioneer romances, "The Emigrant Trail." Heretofore she has devoted her attention to different phases of the lives of early Californians and their descendants but in "The Emigrant Trail" she went back to the beginning of things, and though the story is almost devoid of the stock sensations of the average crossing the plains narrative, it is doubtful whether the same thing has ever been done so well before or is likely to be improved upon. Elinor Gates also has turned her attention from romance to drama.

"Leaders of Quality"

Established 1857

NEW YORK

Lula Chamberlain's work grows in interest and importance. The forward stride which she is taken within the few years since, in collaboration with her sister Esther, she wrote "The Blue Room" is surprising. "Mrs. Essington," her second effort, was a creditable light novel, but in "The Coast of Chance" and "The Other Side of the Border" she found herself. "Son of the Wind," her contribution for this year, is not only well written, but on a theme unique and unexpected. Girl heroes have grown common enough since the Robinson-Seton set the example, but the animal cross apt to be transformed, a hybrid which, while retaining its outward form, is endowed with human passions and reason and recognizable as either fish, flesh, fowl nor good red herring. Miss Michelson did no new work, her one contribution being a story which appeared some years ago in an English magazine. Juliet Wilbur Bonkins, likewise, found time only for editing and rearranging her stories, though her name has appeared often as contributor to the periodicals. Her "Top o' the Morning" is made up of the sketches which ran through Munsey's as "The Chronicles of Us," and singularly enough, they are able to find commendation amongst critics who, one would suppose, would recognize the types as familiar to themselves. The people concerned were a small group of artists and writers who earned their bread and butter by pen and pencil, lived decently and paid their bills, but literary Bohemia demands garrets and cocottes, banquets and lunches, and above all things, squalor and debauchery. "Fathers and Mothers" is made up of a generous collection of short tales each dealing with the relation of parents and children. Mr. Douglas Wiggin gave us but one short volume, "Susanna and Sue," a story of Quaker life, her attention being claimed by the staging of "Rebecca," the dramatic version compounded of her two books, "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm" and "New Chronicles of Rebecca." The play has not yet reached the Pacific Coast, but it is too much to expect that the stage version will prove quite so good as the story.

Marion Hill's "Bennie-boy" follows the same line as Mrs. Martin's "Emmy Lou," depicting the struggles of a small boy with the pitfalls of public school instruction. Books about children are less of a novelty than they were a few years ago and Bennie can hardly expect the same attention that was attracted by "The Pettison Twins," though he is not less engaging in his way.

Louis J. Stellman's collection of his own photographs of the city ruins, accompanied by appropriate verses is more of an artistic than a literary production, and Ernest Peixotto's "Romantic California" is likewise a combination of literary and artistic merit.

Jerome Hart's "Vigilante Girl" made use of the episodes of and characters of that Pioneer era, facts thinly veiled as fiction and more or less modified to suit the purposes of the author. As is inevitable whenever the morals and manners of early days come up for discussion, there was ample room for divergence of opinion, but the presentation was so unsatisfactory on the whole that the remnant of the Pioneer Society which is most interested in the preservation of the truth thought seriously of taking action to condemn Mr. Hart's story. There are few of the old guard left now, scarcely more than two hundred, and as all have passed the Scriptural limit, the occasion was passed with only a mild breeze instead of the hurricane it once would have produced.

Will Irwin's "Rosalie the Medium" proved to be poor stuff, altogether unworthy of its author. Wallace Irwin's verses still continue to delight readers of periodicals and are the exception which proves the rule, for, he, at least, has succeeded in making poetry, verse, rhyme, whatever you may choose to call it a paying proposition.

When Bailey Millard writes a novel it is sure to be so good that one is between minds, whether to wish he would produce more or to congratulate him on the restraint which withholds his pen until he has something besides ink to put on paper. His "Sea Hawk" has for its motive pearl poaching in the Gulf of California, an unique theme with an unhackneyed environment, and his characters, for the most part, fit where he has located them.

Frederick Bechdolt has given us a volume of short stories and Mrs. Lowenberg's second novel, "The Crime of a Nation," dealing with the lack of uniformity in divorce laws, is at the present moment one of the books under discussion. George Wharton James compiled a "California Birthday Book," the selections for each day being from some Californian's work. His "Heroes of California" might properly be designated as an index to the history of the State, for though it is a good-sized and compact volume, its author has designed nothing more than to indicate the store of wealth the student may uncover for himself.

A posthumous volume of the poems of Miss French, published under the supervision of her friends at Carmel, was almost the only one of the year, though the names of the Californians, both presents residents and those of the past, have helped to swell the tables of contents of the periodicals.

Our literary visitors have been for the most part birds of passage. Mrs. Atherton is really at home when she comes here, and Elbert Hubbard is a perennial affliction. Harold MacGrath was detained in quarantine, and merely passed through on his way from the Orient. Zona Gale and Lincoln Steffens made but a brief stay and letter than its fellows, walked in our midst. Williamsons were gone before their presence was realized. Seumas MacManus took no active part in social or literary activities and John D. Though the death of Mark Twain brought sorrow wherever the English language is spoken, he belonged to all the world, Nevada and Virginia where his earliest work was done, have resigned their claim. Louis Alexander Johnson's long martyrdom wore to a peaceful end. Death also claimed Margaret Collier Graham, the author of several notable volumes of histories, and Alice Kingsbury Cooley, known to a former generation as both writer and actress. The three established monthly periodicals, the Out West and the Overland Monthly, upheld their own but the large crop of intimate weeklies that appeared after the great local have virtually all withered by the way. Our two local publishers, A. M. Robertson and Paul Elder, have brought out their annual of good things well done. stantly, or justice hid itself more timidly, in the present day. Beside, cold and pinched, with voices rendered hoarse by all the gin their parents had imbibed, shouting out the names of newspapers, flourishes, broadsheets on which the headings told of wars, adulteries, cheating and robbery; and smug-faced citizens and prurient-minded girls, their pink-and-white complexions, strangely at variance with the twinkle in their eyes, eagerly stopped and bought them, jostling the men as if by accident, pleased at the contact with them as they passed, and yet taking offense at once if but a word was said, saving their conscience in the national way, which finds all things permissible if but due silence is preserved.

So dull and strenuous was the life that it appeared impossible in other lands the sun was shining, and that the brown-faced men and merry black-haired women had time to love and be beloved.

But that naught might be wanting to set forth the kindlier aspects of our pomp and state, in a small narrow street well strewn with offal from the stalls of coster-mongers' barrows, under the flaming light of naphtha lamps, a line of men stood waiting at the door of a soup kitchen at which some charitable soul or council had provided refreshment for the body—that body which, we know, matters so little in a transitory life.

The mud had eaten holes into their clothes, and their pinched faces under the electric light, drink-swollen and blotched, looked corpse-like as they stood shivering in the snow, which, falling down like feathers on their hats, gave them a look as if they had been supers at the pantomime of life, and at some signal from the wing would break into a dance.

The stream of passers-by watched them unmoved, thinking no doubt that idleness or drink had brought them to their present situation; and as they waited for their turn some coughed and others scratched themselves, or muttering it was "hellish cold" shuffled and stamped as the snow melted on their hair and filtered through their rags.

On every side the strenuous current of the world flowed past them, leaving them stranded on the mud, with the safe shores of progress and of wealth slipping away from them, as a spent swimmer, struggling for his life, watches the banks of a swift-running stream race past before his eyes.

Sometimes the line of men swayed like a wounded snake upon the road as one of them passed through the door, and as the others waited for their turn one muttered to a chum, "Blime me, cheer up! it'll be better under Socialism," and spat upon the stones.

Nonsense

In a New Brunswick village a town character who preferred emphasis to the verities was a witness in a petty trial involving an auger. He positively identified it as the property of the parties to the suit.

"But," asked the attorney for the other side, "do you swear that you know this auger?"

"Yes, sir."

"How long have you known it?" he continued.

"I have known that auger," said the witness impressively, "ever since it was a gimlet."

The Game of Billiards

By Alphonse Daudet

As they have been fighting two days, and have passed the night with their knapsacks on, beneath a flood of rain, the soldiers are completely exhausted. And yet for three mortal hours they have been left waiting, with grounded arms, in the puddles of the high roads and the mud of the saturated fields.

Benumbed by fatigue, by sleepless nights, and with their uniforms drenched with rain, they crowd together to warm and comfort one another. There are some who sleep standing, leaning against a neighbor's knapsack, and weariness and privations can be read distinctly upon those relaxed faces, overcome with sleep. Rain, mud, no fire, nothing to eat, a low, black sky, and the enemy in the air about. It is funereal.

What were they doing there? What is going on? The guns, with their muzzles pointed toward the wood, have the appearance of watching something. The mitrailleurs in ambush stare fixedly at the horizon. Everything seems ready for an attack. Why do they not attack? What are they waiting for?

They are awaiting orders, and headquarters sends none.

And yet the headquarters are not far away. They are at yonder stately Louis-Treize chateau, whose red bricks, scoured by the rain, glisten among the trees half-way up the hill. Truly a princely dwelling, quite worthy to bear the banner of a marshal of France. Behind a broad moat and a stone wall which separate them from the road, smooth green lawns, lined with vases of flowers, extend to the porch. On the other side, the private side of the house, the horn-beam hedges show luminous gaps; the pond in which swans are swimming lies like a mirror, and beneath the pagodalike roof of an enormous aviary, peacocks and golden pheasants flash their wings and display their plumage, uttering shrill cries amid the foliage. Although the owners have gone away, one does not feel the abandonment, the desolation of war. The oriflamme of the leader of the army has safeguarded even the tiniest flowers in the lawns, and it is an impressive thing to find so near the battlefield that opulent tranquility that is born of perfect order, of the accurate alignment of the shrubbery, of the silent depths of the avenues.

The rain, which fills the roads yonder with such disgusting mud, and digs such deep ruts, here is nothing more than an elegant, aristocratic shower, reviving the red of the bricks and the green of the lawns, polishing the leaves of the orange trees and the white feathers of the swans. Everything glistens, everything is peaceful. Really, but for the flag floating on the roof, but for the two soldiers on sentry-go before the gate, one would never suspect that it is the headquarters of an army. The horses are resting in the stables. Here and there one sees a groom, or an orderly in undress uniform, loitering about the kitchen, or a gardener in red trousers placidly drawing his rake over the gravel in the great courtyards.

The dining room, the windows of which look upon the porch, discloses a half-cleared table; uncorked bottles, soiled and empty plates on the rumpled cloth; the end of a banquet, after the guests have gone. In the adjoining room one may hear loud voices, laughter, the clicking of balls and the clinking of glasses. The marshal is playing his game of billiards, and that is why the army is waiting for orders. When the marshal had begun his game, the heavens might fall, but nothing in the world could prevent him from finishing it.

Billiards! that is the weakness of that great warrior. He stands there, as grave as in battle, in full uniform, his breast covered with medals, with kindled eyes, flushed cheeks, excited by feasting, grog, and the game. His aides-de-camp surround him, zealous and respectful, uttering admiring exclamations at each of his strokes. When the marshal makes a point, they all hasten to mark it; when the marshal is thirsty, they all rush to prepare his grog. There is a constant rustling of epaulettes and plumes, a jingling of medals; and to see all those sweet smiles, those artful, courtierlike reverences, all those new uniforms and embroidery in that lofty apartment, with its oaken wainscoting, looking upon parks and courts of honor, recalls the autumn days at Compeigne, and affords the eyes a little rest from the stained cloaks that shiver yonder along the roads, forming such sombre groups in the rain.

The marshal's opponent is a young captain of the staff, belted and curled and light-gloved, who is in the first rank of billiard players and capable of beating all the marshals on earth; but he has the tact to keep a respectful distance behind his chief, and devotes his energies to the task of not winning, and at the same time not losing too easily. He is what is called an officer with a future.

Attention, young man, let us be on our guard! The marshal has fifteen, and you ten. The point is to keep the game in that condition to the end; then you will have done more for your promotion than if you were outside with the others, beneath those torrents of water which drown the horizon, soiling your aiguillettes, awaiting orders which do not come.

It is really an interesting game. The balls roll and clash and mingle their colors. The cushions send them merrily back; the cloth waxes hot. Suddenly the flash of a cannon shot passes across the sky. A dull sound rattles the windows. Everybody starts, and they look at each other anxiously. The marshal alone has neither seen nor heard anything; leaning over the table, he is busily engaged in planning a magnificent draw-shot; draw-shots are his strong point.

But there comes another flash, then another. The cannon shots succeed each other in hot haste. The aides-de-camp run to the windows. Can it be that the Prussians are attacking?

"Very well, let them attack!" says the marshal, chalking his cue. "It's your turn, captain."

The staff quivers with admiration. Turenne asleep upon a gun carriage was nothing compared to this marshal, who plays billiards so tranquilly at the moment of going into action. Meanwhile the uproar redoubles. With the roar of the cannon is mingled the tearing sound of the intrailleuses, the rattle of musketry. A red steam, black at the edges, rises around the lawns. The whole park is on fire. The terrified peacocks and pheasants shriek in the aviary; the Arabian horses, smelling the powder, rear in the stables. The headquarters begins to be excited. Despatch after despatch. Courtiers arrive at full speed. They ask for the marshal.

The marshal cannot be seen. Did I not tell you that nothing could prevent him from finishing his game?

"It is your turn, captain."

But the captain is distraught. That is what it is to be young. Behold he loses his head, forgets his tactics, and makes two runs in succession, which almost give him the game. Thereupon the marshal becomes furious. Surprise and indignation animate his manly face. Just at this moment a horse ridden at a hard gallop rushes into the courtyard. An aide-de-camp covered with mud forces his way past the sentries and ascends the steps at one bound. "Marshal, marshal!" You see how he is greeted. Puffing with anger and red as a rooster, the marshal appears at the window, his billiard cue in his hand:

"What's the matter? What's all this? Is there any sentry there?"

"But, marshal—"

"All right, in a moment; wait for my orders in God's name!"

And the window is violently closed.

Wait for his orders! That is just what they are doing, the poor fellows. The wind drives the rain and the grape-shot full in their faces. Whole battalions are wiped out, while other stand useless, with their arms in readiness, utterly unable to understand their inaction. Nothing to do. They are awaiting orders. However as one needs no orders to die, the men fall by hundreds behind the shrubs, in the moats, in front of the great silent chateau. Even after they have fallen, the grape tears them still, and from the open wounds the generous blood of France flows noiselessly. Above, in the billiard room, it is getting terribly warm, too; the marshal has recovered his lead, but the little captain is defending himself like a lion.

Seventeen! eighteen! nineteen!

They hardly have time to mark the points. The roar of the battle draws nearer. The marshal has but one more to go. Already shells are bursting in the park. Suddenly one bursts over the pond. The mirror is shattered; a swan in deadly alarm swims wildly about amid an eddy of bloody feathers. That is the last stroke.

Then, a profound silence. Only the rain falling in the hedges, a confused rumbling at the foot of the hill, and, along the muddy roads, sound like the trampling of a hurrying flock. The army is in full retreat. The marshal has won the game.

at eased only the call of the night cecco broke e nce of the world.
"Is the Signore hear that whistling devil?"
id lisse. He came and touched my hand.
"What does it say then?" I asked.
"I know not!" said Ulisse, quietly, "Some evil is doubtless. How should I know what it ys! Has the Gesu Cristo given me that grace?
o, ignore, He only gave that gift once, and er was to the rich Simone in the Gospel."
"What gift?" said I.
"The gift, Signore, to understand the speech f the beasts."
"Tl me," said I.
"Signore, I forget, and besides I am more hunry than was Sampietro when he stole the ham—"
"What?" said I.
"Signore, it happened thus. Il Santo Gesu and the apostles had walked far and far through the illness. Signore, they were more weary than can say, and hungry—but hungry! Presently on way they saw a little village, and when they in there they went into the shop to buy some-ing to eat. Now while Gesu Cristo was bar-aining with the Padrone, Sampietro spied a arranging in a dark corner; so he hid it under is oak and they went on their way. When he had gone a certain distance and were sat ow to eat, Sampietro said 'Eccolo! Maestro, ce that I found,' and he brought out the ham.
"It Gesu Cristo said, "Sampietro, one ought of to steal the things of others."
"Oh," said Sampietro, 'I found it, Maestro.'
"If you found it," said our Lord, 'do you know why you must do? You must go back and cry high the village, "Has anyone lost a ham?"
for no one claims it you may have it.'

"Signore, Sampietro was very sad as he went alone, hungry, too, all the way back to the village —sad, but thoughtful. And when he came to the street he cried at the top of his voice, 'Has anyone lost—' and then in a whisper 'a ham?' And this he did more than once, but no one answered.
Then he returned to our Lord and the other Apostles. 'No,' said he smiling, 'no one claims it, we can eat it.'
"But Gesu Cristo, who knows everything, said,
'Turn again, Sampietro, along with Me.' So they returned together to the village. And when they were come into the street Gesu Cristo said,
'Cry aloud, Sampietro,' and Sampietro cried—what else could he do?—'Has anyone lost a ham?'
And immediately the Padrone ran out and claimed it. But Sampietro for a little did nothing but weep.
"And another day too, Signore, it befell again that our Lord and the Apostles had made a long journey. Signore, it was July and hot—but hot! and to reach a certain village by nightfall it was necessary to journey through the day.
And that country was full of mountains, difficult to climb without weariness. Also they were hungry, and as the Signore may imagine it was not Sampietro who had most pazienza.
"Suddenly Gesu Cristo said, 'We will all eat at the top of the hill.' But He bade each of them pick up a stone and carry it to the top. And so, Signore, all the Apostles took up a great stone and carried it on their shoulders, save our Sampietro, who picked up a pebble—but in truth a pebble, snorting and grumbling the while.
"When they were come to the summit at last, Gesu Cristo said, 'Place the stones on the ground.' And they placed them on the ground.
Then our Lord stretched forth His hand and blessed the stones and the stones became bread.
And each satisfied his hunger; but Sampietro remained fasting with only a crumb to eat.

"And not long after the same thing befell—another long journey with hunger and weariness.
And again at the foot of a great hill our Lord bade them all carry a stone to the top. And so they did. But our Sampietro, who remembered his fast, carried, groaning and sweating the while, a great rock—Signore, a veritable boulder—on his back.' But he said all the while in his heart, 'At least I shall have enough to eat this time.'
"And when they were come to the summit Gesu Cristo said, 'Place the stones on the ground,' but He did not bless them. After a minute Sampietro said, 'Maestro, why have we brought these stones hither?'
"And Gesu Cristo answered, 'To sit on. . . .'
"Ulisse," said I, after a time, "it is necessary that these tales be written down, since they have the sound of truth, so that they who know them not may hear them."
"It is my opinion also, Signore," said Ulisse.
"Write them then—you who are always writing."
"That," said I, "is easier to say than to do;
and if I do, be sure that not all who read them will understand, because for some they are too difficult."
"Indeed, yes," said Ulisse, "yet I understand them, and they are good tales concerning our Lord, Madonna, and the Saints whom we love."
"Ulisse," said I, "it occurs to me to write them out tomorrow and to send them to the Americans."
"That," said Ulisse, "would be indeed a Christian act worthy of the Signore, both because the Americans are as often as not no Christians at all, and it would be well to turn their hearts; and because they die with great suddenness and in great numbers, beyond any other people in the world."
"Do they," said I, "how is that? I never heard it before.

"Yes, indeed, Signore," answered Ulisse, "it is true. For Il Gesu Cristo journeyed even in America, and when He was about to depart the Americans said to Him, 'You are going away? What then will You leave us?' And Gesu Cristo answered, 'I leave you Death.'"

"Yes, Signore, this also is true, for the Americans die in hundreds and thousands, and that is why we go to replenish them."

In Memory of Columbine

She tried to rise, but the cumbrous irons in which her leg was fixed prevented her from doing so. She turned a radiant face toward the men.

M. de Courcelles kissed her. He stood by the bedside, holding her hand and talking to her tenderly and humorously, doing his utmost to cheer and amuse her. At last he turned to go, but a very bony little hand detained him.

"The saints have not sent Monsieur another St. Anthony?" she asked, with evident anxiety.

"But no, dear child, not as yet."

"Perhaps they may some day."

"Perhaps, dearie. Good-by."

"Good-by, Monsieur."

The priest conducted M. de Courcelles to the door and gripped his thin white hand so hard that the red marks did not fade from it for a minute or so. Then he ran up the stairs with quite unceremonial speed.

As he entered the room Marie evidently concealed something from him under her pillows. The Abbe Cadic was grieved, but he said nothing. "Now, little one, are you not happy?" he asked. "You have seen your dear friend, and he is going to send you grapes and wine and toys and pretty books." He held up his hands with a gesture that expressed a plenitude of good things.

"I am well content, Father," said the little girl. There was a shade of evasion in her voice, and her face as she turned it toward the window was marked with the anxiety that poverty and the consideration of money write on the faces of the poor, even on their children.

In the weeks that followed Marie grew worse; she had times of great suffering, and the sight of her worn little face saddened the heart of her friend the Abbe more than her death could have done.

A time came when she seemed so near death that he administered the last sacraments. But she rallied for a little, and the pain seemed to cease. But still her troubled little soul looked out piteously through her eyes, as though seeking dumbly something for which she would not ask. One day the Abbe was with her, and her sadness so grieved him that he determined to find out the cause. Marie always set aside some of M. de Courcelles' grapes for her friend. And these he accepted, to please her. He ate the grapes, then spoke, one big hand laid upon her little one. "Dear child," he said, "you are sad, and I would have you go into our dear Lord's presence with a smile. Is there nothing that I can do for you? Your conscience is clear, but something troubles you still; tell it, then, to your old friend, and see whether he cannot help you."

Marie raised her head and looked at him with intense eagerness. "O Father," she said, "would you, could you give me a franc?"

The Abbe Cadic started. This thought of money coming from a dying child shocked him. It seemed to him like a dark cloud obscuring the innocent child's soul. He fumbled in his pockets and produced a franc.

"Here is the franc, Marie."

Her thin, hot fingers seized it; then putting it beside her she began to feel in the mattress for something which was hidden there. To the priest's surprise she presently produced a little hoard of money.

"Count it, Father," she cried.

He counted the coins solemnly. "Six francs and twenty-five centimes."

She turned a radiant face toward him and clasped his hands with both hers. "Dear Father," she said, speaking almost incoherently in her haste, "go thou to Papa Lepage at the corner of the Rue d'Alsace; you will see there a beautiful St. Anthony; he is but six and a half francs, and Papa Lepage promised that I should have him for six, for I have waited to buy him for two years, and I thought I should never get the money, for once when I got it I gave a franc to Mere Coquelin because she had no food, and once I lost fifty centimes through a hole in my pocket. Go there, Father, quickly, lest the Pere Lepage should have sold it."

The Abbe hurried away to Papa Lepage's. He had no artistic sense, this pure-souled, kindly young man, but he was struck by the ugliness of the plaster St. Anthony at his first glance. There it stood, in the sordid little shop, waiting for its child admirer to ransom it. An innocent but deeply-rooted love of bargaining made the priest haggle for some time over the price of the figure; and he was crowned with triumph when he came out of the shop with the bulky possession and a franc to the good. He returned to the child's garret and laid the parcel on the bed, then undid the string, because she was too weak to do so.

She gave a little cry of joy. "Ah! heavens, how beautiful it is, this St. Anthony! And when will Monsieur come and see it? I hope well that I shall live to see his pleasure."

"I shall fetch him now," said the Abbe, and away he went, striding through the rain and praying as he went. I do not think he knew that

Christmas Fare

Though we have borrowed the Christmas tree and the Santa Claus and hanging of stockings from the Germans our ideas of holiday feasting in America are yet built chiefly on the English plan. We have our mince pies and plum pudding, though the traditional boar's head is more likely to take the form of a suckling pig, and the turkey has altogether superseded the Christmas goose which once held the place of honor and the center of the board. The reason is not far to seek, for the goose, despite its traditional hold, is an unsatisfactory bird, affording a disproportionate amount of bone and fat and such flesh as it furnishes is sadly inferior to that of the lordly gobbler. The present generation is apt to look askance at the onion and sage dressing and the apple sauce, assertive in both odor and flavor, yet it was just these qualities which appealed to the men of other days, for they offered an excuse for the bibulous hilarity with which the day was celebrated. An old rhyme has it:

"Ply knife and fork and draw the cork,
And keep the bottle handy,
For each slice of goose will introduce A thimbleful of brandy."

The goose is still popular in Germany, where smoked goose breasts are a choice delicacy.

The original mince pie was an immense pasty made in the form of a cradle and thatched with straw, emblematic of the manger. The large pie gave way in time to a number of small ones but it was not until much later that they were made round instead of coffin-shaped. One must never refuse a portion of the Christmas mince pie, which is emblematic of the good fortune it is hoped the family will partake of during the year.

The boar's head is less easily obtainable today than it was when a goodly portion of the earth still supported forests in which beasts roamed at large but pork in some form appears to be almost a universal Christmas dish. There are the boiled and baked hams prepared after special recipes which grace the great dinners in big houses, but humbler folk look forward to sausage and rashers of bacon. Queen's College, Oxford, has a ceremony all of its own for the bringing in of the boar's head. Tradition has it that some five centuries ago a student, wandering in the forest of Shotover deep in his perusal of Aristotle, was attacked by a boar, and for lack of a better weapon he thrust the philosophy down the brute's throat, exclaiming "Graceum est." The head was borne home in triumph and the event celebrated by the elaborate ceremony still in use. The Norse and Saxon use of the boar's head is attributed to the worship of Freyr, the goddess of peace and plenty, who was represented as riding on a golden boar, but barbecued pig is a Christmas delicacy in the Philippines, and in Genoa the boar's head holds its own as a survival of the custom of the Abbot of San Antonio presenting a boar's head decked in laurel to the head of the house of Doria on Christmas eve.

his innermost heart he was jealous of Marie's love for M. de Courcelles. He wondered why this grave dreamer should win so easily what he himself persistently courted. But that is a riddle solved as mankind and as fresh as the morning dew. When he reached the big house he rang the bell and stood there, dripping with rain and panting. The servant, a supercilious varlet and an avowed priest-hater, told him that M. de Courcelles was engaged. The Abbe urged the importance of his message. The servant replied that his master was engaged with M. Saint-Simon, at that time the greatest philosopher in France. The Abbe grew angry. "M. Saint-Simon can wait, but Death can't," he said, and pushed his way into the hall.

The man showed him into the presence of M. de Courcelles and his famous guest, and for a moment the priest felt an overwhelming shyness. He was of another world, and his world was all white and bleak, and poverty-stricken, while the other was warm and cultured and smooth. He looked awkwardly. There was appeal in his eyes. "Is your little Columbine," he blurted out; "is she dying, Monsieur; can you not come with me?"

M. de Courcelles looked from one man to the other; perhaps he was noting the contrast. Then he returned to M. Saint-Simon. "You will excuse me," he said, and followed the priest out into the hall. They walked so quickly that the older man could scarcely find breath to speak; but his younger companion related to him the story of the sadness of Columbine, of her secret, and of the purchase of the figure.

"It is very ugly," he said.

"M. l'Abbe, I am not blind; I shall not fail to see its beauty."

As they went into the garret, Marie's aunt and cousin withdrew to the door. The child appeared almost unconscious, and she did not recognize M. de Courcelles until he bent over her and held her in his arms. Then she opened her eyes and looked at him with rapture. "Monsieur, the saints have sent you another St. Anthony—oh, how so beautiful! They have colored him while he kept you waiting. See."

The priest handed him the figure.

"Dear child," said M. de Courcelles, "I have never had a present I valued so much. I shall put it in the place of the old one, and look at it every morning and night, and remember the little Columbine, and—" His voice broke suddenly. He knelt beside the bed holding one wasted little hand; and the priest—jealously, one must admit—kneeling the other while he knelt in prayer.

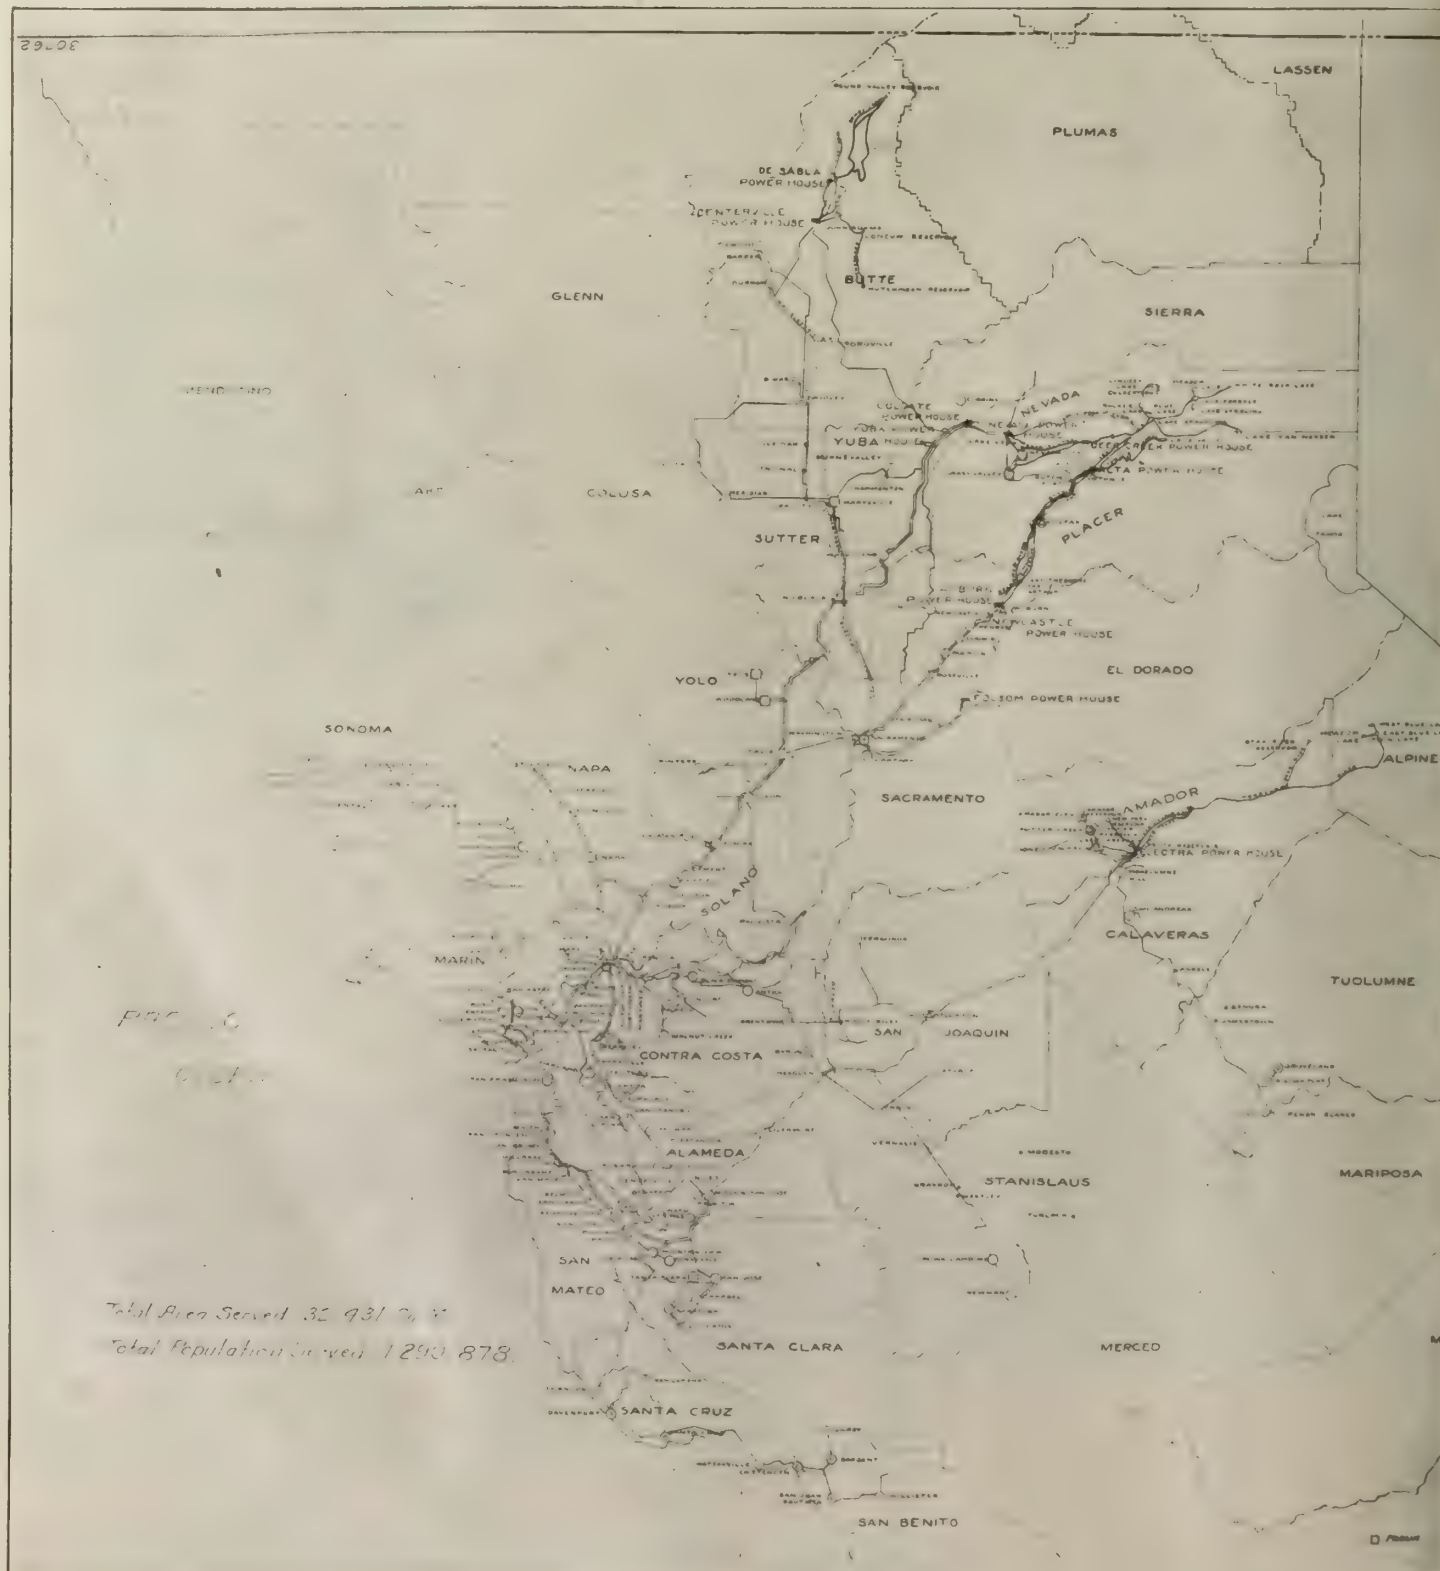

Columbine, with a great content in her heart, fell asleep; and looking at her, they saw that she was dead.

The Abbe and M. de Courcelles went downstairs. They were both weeping, and they did not try to conceal it. The Abbe wiped his eyes with a magenta-colored handkerchief. Then he fumbled in his pockets for string.

"I will fasten him up for you," he said huskily, as he took the figure from M. de Courcelles. "You were kind of you, Monsieur, to accept him, for this is an ugly fellow, and his cheeks are too rosy for a saint."

M. de Courcelles leaned against the door. "He is an ugly fellow, M. l'Abbe, as you say," he answered; "but he speaks to me of that which is most beautiful in the world—of the humanity of Christ, of child love and child innocence. He speaks to me of that which is real. He calls me out of dreamland to see what is lovely, and yet tangible, and common as the daisies in the grass. I have sought the light through dim and phantasmal places, I have looked for it with aching eyes; and now a little child and an ugly plaster figure have shown it to me. I shall not forget." That is why the ugly St. Anthony stands beside M. de Courcelles' bed.

Milos M. Gopcevic, Optimist

Among the men of San Francisco who make large investments and are constantly extending the field of their operations Milos Gopcevic occupies a prominent position. For several years now he has taken a hand in moneyed affairs in this city and has given himself a shrewd and successful career. Real estate is the particular field of his business activity and he is distinguished by the characteristic which the successful real estate man always possesses—he is an incurable optimist.

Mr. Gopcevic is not in the general real estate business. He devotes his time solely to his own properties, but those are so extensive that they fully occupy the hours which he gives to business. The Gopcevic holdings are scattered all over California. The most picturesque of them are located in beautiful Clear Lake in Lake County, the most valuable are right here in the heart of San Francisco.

It is in connection with his realty holdings in San Francisco that Mr. Gopcevic manifests his dominating characteristic of optimism. Like all San Franciscans who are on the tax roll at the time of the calamity of 1906, he lost heavily. But his losses failed to imbue him with any feelings of discouragement. Very unostentatiously he set about the task of rehabilitating his property and succeeded so well that today he is ranked among the most progressive and prosperous landlords of the new San Francisco.

Mr. Gopcevic has visited and studied the great cities of the world and is in a position to compare them with San Francisco. He regards this city as one of the great cosmopolitan centers of the future, like London and New York. He pins his faith to San Francisco. Better than that he backs his faith in San Francisco by hard work for betterment.

It is eighteen years now since Gopcevic came to this city. He came with the glamour of a great name. The Gopcevic family has a history which goes back one thousand years and is practically the history of Serbia for all that time. For centuries members of the family reigned in the southern European kingdom and the annals of southern Europe are filled with the stories of their chivalry. When the vicissitudes of fate cast them from the throne their vassals, the Obrenovics and the Karageorgevics, came to the front; but the Gopcevic family was famous and so endeared to the hearts of the Servians that even today they could sit on the throne if they cared to plunge their native land into war.

Milos Gopcevic first came into social prominence here when he married Miss Harry Floyd, the daughter of old Captain Floyd, in 1903. The marriage caused a great sensation. It was a romance of love with many pretty circumstances, and the wedded life of the couple was ideally happy. They lived in great happiness until Mrs. Gopcevic died. Those who enjoyed their hospitality in this city or at beautiful Konotayee on Clear Lake know how completely they were wrapped up in each other. It was a severe blow to Milos Gopcevic when his wife died. It was also a great blow when some of his dead wife's so-called "friends," people who were the beneficiaries of her benevolence, assailed her will and tried to deprive her husband of her estate. But after one of the bitterest and most extraordinary will contests ever conducted in this state Gopcevic succeeded in saving the million dollar estate which had been left to him.

MILOS M. GOPCEVIC

Several months ago Gopcevic married again, his bride being Miss Marion Dodd, a cultured woman who, like her husband, has small regard for the social career which satisfies so many of our wealthy people. They live quietly and entertain without ostentation both at their residence in this city and at their estate on Clear Lake.

The Gopcevic estate on Clear Lake, called Konotayee, is one of the most beautiful places in the State. The house was built by Captain Floyd and is everywhere reminiscent of the eccentric old sea captain. The verandas have the curve of a hurricane deck and are religiously holystoned. There is a chart room full of nautical instruments and books and maps of the sea, all kept as they were in Captain Floyd's lifetime. The house is full of rare art treasures, statues, de luxe editions and strange bibelots. It contains pictures of Harry Floyd in the suits of armor and other medieval costumes of which she was passionately fond. There are also portraits of the old Servian kings who were Milos Gopcevic's ancestors. To wander through the rooms is to breathe the atmosphere of old-world enchantment. The acres of cultivated ground around the house, laid out in formal parterres of flowers and rare shrubs and fruit-trees, are kept up with the most scrupulous care. In the boat house are the fastest steam launches on the lake.

In this enchanting spot Milos Gopcevic spends a great deal of his leisure time, making visits to this city to look after his real estate interests. He knows how to concentrate his mind on business when there is business to attend to, and equally he knows how to enjoy himself when the duties of business have been disposed of.

A man of European cultivation, with a magnetic personality, a shrewd but kindly observer of human nature and a doer of quiet charities, Milos Gopcevic is an exceptional man. But to the public which knows him merely as a man of investments his most appealing quality is his optimism, the optimism which he expends on San Francisco and which San Francisco certainly needs.

Cause for Concern

"Here," shouted the railway official, "what do you mean by throwing those trunks about like that?"

The porter gasped in astonishment, and several travelers pinched themselves to make sure that it was real. Then the official spoke again.

The Truth About Our Traction System

By Thomas Q. Bentley

Apparently public-service corporations are among the most popular subjects of criticism. The reason is obvious. The service they render is more widespread than that of any individual or any other kind of corporation. Now even though it were possible to render perfect service of any kind it would nevertheless be impossible to compel perfect satisfaction. The most priceless of human privileges is that of being dissatisfied. The butcher with fifty customers is grumbled at by at least a dozen. The plumber is universally execrated. The dry goods' merchant meets customers every day who know how to run his business better than he does. Even the best of cooks doesn't meet with the approbation of the whole family. The mother-in-law is invariably a failure. Yet criticism of none of these can be quite so popular as criticism of the traction system that transports a whole community every day in the week. Hence criticism of the United Railroads is always assured of an enthusiastic hearing.

The United Railroads is accused of being indifferent to the public welfare. To what extent this is true we may learn by a process somewhat different from the one usually pursued,—by ascertaining rather what it has done than what it has not done. But before pursuing this inquiry it may be well to take occasion to observe that no matter what the company has done or may do it will never be able to escape caustic criticism; for it is never likely to solve the problem of giving as good service during rush hours as at other times. In no city in the world has this problem been solved, and in this city it is especially difficult of solution for two reasons: first, because of the exceptionally large suburban traffic that is handled between the hours of six and nine every morning and five and eight every evening. Between fifty and sixty thousand people rush to and from this city between those hours; secondly, because of the number and degree of street grades which make it impossible to operate more than a limited number of cars at one time on certain streets. These are facts that the critics of the company never consider. Nor do the critics ever consider other conspicuous disadvantages from which the company has suffered; such, for example, as the destruction of the system by fire and earthquake; the revengeful persecution for years of its leading officials; the most disastrous strike in the history of street railroading, a strike which even the leaders of organized labor have admitted was absolutely unjustifiable, and yet a strike that was prosecuted without protest from the press and with the aid and sympathy of a powerful cabal.

Now as to what has been done by the corporation. There has been a total reconstruction of 77½ miles of track. There have also been 22¾ miles of new track, and extensions to old lines constructed during this period. The new lines are Fulton street, from Twenty-fourth to Forty-ninth avenues; Railroad avenue, additional track from Sixteenth to Thirty-second avenues; Sunny-side avenue, from Baden street to Genesee street; Visitacion Valley line from Mission street near Amazon to San Bruno road; Sixteenth street from Kansas to Seventh street; Gough street, McAllister street, Market street, Cortland avenue, and the entire system of the Parkside Transit Company. This makes a total of 100¼ miles of track constructed since the fire.

All of the reconstructed lines, where a light rail was formerly used, have been rebuilt with heavy girder rails. This construction is of the most improved design, as worked out from the experience of actual work done in the larger Eastern cities and consists of a standard Trilby rail of 108 pounds to the yard on the lesser traveled streets, and on the streets where traffic is heavier, such as Mission street, Market street, Fillmore street, and part of Valencia street, the rails are 141 pounds to the yard, the heaviest rail laid for any street railway. These rails are laid on the best redwood ties, rock ballast, with a concrete foundation for pavement.

The 100¼ miles of track have all been paved with basalt blocks and asphalt in the populated districts, and macadam on the outskirts. In addition to this, the company has overhauled and repaved approximately 27 miles of track, making in all over 127 miles of new track in four years. The company has also replaced 375 pieces of special work at its crossings, curves and turnouts, consisting of the most modern heavy Manganese construction, with twelve additional layouts.

During this time, the company has put in service 250 new cars of the larger type and twelve suburban cars on the San Mateo branch, besides building eighteen of the larger cable cars for the Sacramento and Castro street lines, and a great many of the old electric cars have been practically rebuilt, with 80 pay-as-you-enter cars being built at the present time.

In addition to the work along its tracks, the company has made street improvements by paving the streets adjoining its property holdings, in connection with the abutting property owners at many locations in the outlying districts; also a great many new bituminous and cement sidewalks in front of its buildings destroyed by the fire, and its old buildings, where the sidewalks were ordered removed by the health department. The company has rebuilt its cable powerhouse at Mason and Washington streets, and built an additional car barn and power station on Pacific avenue for the Pacific avenue cable line. It has repaired and reconstructed practically all of the buildings damaged by the fire.

The United Railroads' interests have purchased the Stanislaus Electric Power Company, and a contract between that company and the United Railroads of San Francisco has been made whereby the Stanislaus Electric Power Company will soon furnish ample power for the operation of the railway system in San Francisco and for all proposed extensions for many years to come.

The company has had to bear a very heavy expense on account of the reconstruction of the city's sewer system, by reason of obstructions to the operation of its cars and the actual cost of taking cars off its tracks during the progress of the city's work, and the rehabilitation of its tracks after completion of the same.

The total cost of tracks, buildings and equipment, exclusive of the Stanislaus Electric Power Company, is approximately $11,000,000.

Considering the difficulties encountered, the most remarkable accomplishment of reconstruction and re-establishment of car service known in street railway history was exemplified by the United Railroads of San Francisco. The San Francisco disaster was one of the greatest calamities in history. The reconstruction of the city is undoubtedly the greatest industrial achievement in history. The story of the disaster has never been properly written. When it is, it will be an interesting work, but it will pale in interest before the greater story of reconstruction. In these two histories the names of the men who rebuilt the United Railroads should loom large. So should the names of the men who harassed them and impeded their efforts.

In April, 1906, Patrick Calhoun found on his hands several hundred miles of wrecked street railway worth originally $75,000,000. He has carried the system through a half-dozen strikes, two of them costing him several million dollars, through a severe financial depression and through the most unusual and distressing business attacks. In December, 1910, the system is better than ever before, one of the best street railway systems in the United States, with improvements constantly being made and projected.

And now as to the immediate future. The company is soon to introduce the pay-as-you-enter car. Eighty in all of the big vehicles will be introduced in February. These cars have many advantages, the chief of which is that they obviate the necessity of the conductor's leaving the back platform to collect fares. His duty will be to see that passengers are safely on the car before it is started. There will be no congestion on the rear platform. Wherever these cars have been introduced they have met with public approval.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—There is very little comment to make of the Wall Street situation during the past week. Operations for the six days have been of a backing and filling policy by banking syndicates, with the professional contingent on the stock exchange for doing the bulk of the business. Stocks have shown accumulation by the important interests and weakness during this period with a result that the closing transactions are at the best prices of the week. There has been nothing of interest to affect sentiment in the business or financial atmosphere since the assembling of Congress and there probably will not be at this session, hence the important menace or uncertainty to trade is terminated. The end of the year dullness in the steel industry is at hand and conditions for the early half of 1911 are not at all favorable for the steel corporation, though it is believed a moderate volume of business will be seen. We believe that before the year 1910 closes, stocks will be given an upward whirl against a heavy and stubborn short interest.

Wheat—An extremely narrow range of prices and a correspondingly small volume of business has been seen in wheat the past week. Shorts of the smaller calibre have been disposed to buy on very modest declines rather than to put out any more wheat. Nevertheless there has been no aggressive buying to lift values far from the low points. Liverpool cables speak of fear of manipulation in Chicago largely offsetting the effect of larger and cheaper offerings from Argentine and Australia. The official report of the crop of New South Wales bears out the claims from merchandising sources that the Australian wheat crop is a large one and with 15,000,000 bushels carried over from the old crop, the available supply is the largest on record there. The weather in Argentine has been ideal, the quality of wheat is said to be excellent and crop estimates are being increased. About the only bull argument in wheat at the moment is the continued drought in our southwest where rain is urgently needed and if a cold snap should develop without any moisture, numerous complaints of damage would be heard from that quarter as the plant is in a very delicate condition and is not in shape to withstand a severe freeze.

Corn—The corn market has been a choppy affair all week and the range of prices has been within two cents. Receipts of corn for the week in Chicago are 2,000,000 bushels more than were shipped out. Cash demand has been very slow with prices gradually weakening and stocks are beginning to accumulate. The eastern demand which has held up pretty well is also slow and it looks as if this demand has been satisfied for the time being. Usually at this time of the year there is a good demand from the south but the crop in that locality was so large that they are asking for bids on their surplus corn. Export demand is quiet with Argentine furnishing the continent with corn at prices much below us. At the moment there does not seem to be anything that would give us anything but a natural rally from an oversold pit condition.

Cotton—The opening of the week found the market in a somewhat easier position. Liverpool markets were inclined to be weak although spot sales were large. The continent was reported a large seller in Liverpool and English importers were selling also. Weekly trade reports by Bradstreet and Dun were unsatisfactory. Fall River advices are to the effect that there will be a further curtailment, as more cotton goods are being made than there is a demand for at prices commensurate with cotton costs. Receipts continue very heavy at all ports compared with last year and the "into sight" movement for the week is almost twice the amount of last year. As yet, however, the movement is without effect on values as sentiment remains very bullish. The National Ginners' Association report made the amount ginned from December 1 to December 13 476,000 bales against 480,000 last year. This report caused quite a rally in prices with the market holding quite firm up to the end of the week. If the Government confirms this amount ginned during the last period it will mean that 99 per cent of the crop has been picked and will indicate a crop of 11,059,000 bales and that the ginning will be completed by January 1. Believers in a large crop are therefore inclined to reduce their estimates and the Government report is expected to show whether or not stories of a startling falling off in ginning are facts or fancies. Meanwhile trade conditions are so bad that the cotton mills of the country are running between 80 and 90 per cent of their capacity and steel and iron mills to an average of only 50 per cent.

Local Securities—Our own local market for stocks and bonds has been rather a holiday affair throughout the better part of this month. The chief activity among the listed stocks centers in California Wine common, Associated Oil, City Electric and the Hawaiian Sugar group. The official announcement of the commencement of dividends on California Wine preferred is about the only important development during the week. Of the unlisted securities, Pacific Gas & Electric common continues the leader and is showing a better demand, at better prices, recently. Local bonds are quiet with practically no changes.

Foiled

He was very bashful and she tried to make it easy for him. They were driving along the seashore and she became silent for a time.

"What's the matter?" he asked.

"O, I feel blue," she replied. "Nobody loves me and my hands are cold."

"You should not say that," was his word of consolation, "for God loves you, and your mother loves you, and you can sit on your hands."

Auto Notes

An interesting and unusual automobile record is claimed by George Miller who recently drove his Thomas "High Gear" car on the five day reliability run of the Chicago Motor Club. Miller was the mechanic during the New York to Paris race around the world. At the finish of the Chicago run, Miller's car which had been used by the Technical Committee, was also used as the examination car. A brake test was conducted in one city block, the competitive cars being forced to speed their cars to 20 miles an hour from a standing start, within a specified distance, and then at a signal, stop them within a specified distance. The Thomas car carried the examining committee and was forced to travel back and forth in the one city block for about seven hours, before the examination was finished. When the first car had been disposed of, the speedometer registered a trifle over 30 miles, which had been covered within the one block.

Traveling nearly 800 miles, half of that distance over the rough and hilly roads of Wisconsin, without replenishing the water in the car's radiator, was a noteworthy feature of the recent run of a number of new Hupmobiles from the Detroit factory to Chicago and points in Indiana, Illinois and Wisconsin. The car which thus withstood the severe test was a torpedo model, driven by H. Field, of Rice Lake, Wis., which was the objective point of the trip. Upon arrival at Rice Lake Mr. Field filled the radiator—the first time since leaving Detroit—and found that it lacked but three-quarters of being full.

In the recent Olympia Automobile Show which is the big annual motor car affair of England, reports declare that a decided trend toward the medium horsepower popular priced car was evidenced. In consequence a number of American makes which come under this category were very much noticed, among the most prominent being the White Gasoline Car.

In pursuance of their campaign recently inaugurated to help the consumer minimize his tire expense, the Diamond Rubber Company has just published a folder entitled "Ten Good Ways to Reduce Your Tire Expense." This folder is being mailed to some 65,000 owners and drivers on the Pacific Coast.

James F. Morgan, president of the Honolulu Chamber of Commerce, has just taken delivery of a 1911 Haynes model 20 car. Mr. Morgan who is now in San Francisco returns to the islands next week and will take his new car with him. This model 20 makes the second Haynes owned by the Honolulu capitalist. Two other Haynes cars have just been shipped to the Hawaiian Islands by the local branch of the Haynes Auto Sales Co.

Howard E. Coffin's Hudson "33" has received a welcome of national scope from automobile lovers this fall. San Francisco has proved no exception to the rule, the salesrooms of the Pioneer Automobile Company, 724-732 Golden Gate avenue, having been an extremely lively place since the arrival of the noted designer's latest creation in motor cars. A car by Coffin always interest the automobile public.

The members of the American Association of Advertising Clubs who live in Indianapolis and expect to attend the next annual convention, which will be held at Boston, are preparing to make the trip in Overland automobiles as the guests of Will H. Brown, vice-president of the company.

What is probably the largest individual sale of motor cars for one party's private use ever made in this section of the country has just been closed in San Francisco by The Pioneer Automobile Co.

LUXURIOUS BROOK ELECTRIC

Its supremacy is universally acknowledged, the predominating features being simplicity of operation and control, the revising, signaling, stopping and various speed changes, all coming through one lever. No complicating or confusing attachments, exceptional mileage radius. Demonstrations given at any time to intending purchasers.

CHALMERS

Always at Your Service

A good motor car asks no favors of the weather. The day has passed when owners of automobiles pack their cars in moth balls with the first descent of Jack Frost.

With the arrival of the bracing cold and snowy days, ninety-two per cent of Chalmers owners put on windshields, tops, chains, caps, gloves, warm coats and robes, and—"go to it." It's great!

With top and side curtains, warm robes and a 'hot iron' any car is comfortable all winter long for all members of the family. People don't "wait till spring" any more to buy cars. An automobile is a twelve-month proposition and as serviceable in saving time in one season as another.

OAKLAND

BRANCHES:

FRESNO

Mr. Joseph Frederick, who with his wife, are famed throughout the country as former opera singers, made the purchase, the total of which amounts to $13,333 worth of Lozier machines.

At the opening of the 1910 season the Lozier was practically unknown here except by reputation. With the excellent recommendations given it by its Eastern record, however, it gained an immediate consideration, and before the close of the season was recognized as one of the best sellers among high grade cars. Its long list of local owners is proof of its popularity. Among these owners are Richard Mulcahy, James L. Flood, Walter McCreery, J. A. McCandless, Mortimer Fleishacker, S. G. Noyes, R. A. Sbarboro, S. L. Goldstein, Wm. T. Sesnon, R. I. Bentley, Edwin Eddy, Bert Blanding, Ernest Porter, Harry Williams, Otto Parkhill, E. J. Dodge, Leonard Hammond, William Fries, A. B. Hammond, L. E. Hanchett, Burke Corbett, James Tyson, G. E. Grant, Ludwig Schwabacker, Phil Clay, F. E. Booth, Mrs. A. L. Clay, W. R. Engstrom, A. C. Blumenthal, Senator Geo. H. Nixon, Joseph Fredericks and C. E. Mathewson.

What was probably the largest convention of automobile salesmen ever held, met at the factory of the Chalmers Motor Company, November 28, 29, 30, and December 1. More than 150 automobile dealers and salesmen who represent the Chalmers Motor Company came from all parts of the Western hemisphere to attend the Chalmers Dealers' Convention in Detroit. There were men from the Hawaiian Islands to New York, from Winnipeg to the City of Mexico. Among them were some of the most prominent men in the retail end of the automobile industry.

As the date of the big Panama-Pacific Road Race draws nearer interest in the various cars and drivers that may be expected to enter naturally increases. Among the drivers who demand greatest consideration is Jack Fleming, the Pope-Hartford pilot. Fleming's great victory in the Portola race of last year was the source of com-

1911 Cars Now Here

Rambler
Sixty three

THE 1911 Rambler is now here and orders are being taken for early deliveries of all styles. The line includes landaulets, coupes, limousines, town cars, roadsters, toy tonneaus and five and seven passenger touring cars with detachable fore doors. Details and construction alike for all; two sizes, forty five and thirty four horsepower. Forty inch wheels on all seven-passenger open cars, thirty six inch on all others. Seven-eighths elliptic springs and shock absorbers produce gratifying comfort. The offset crank shaft and straight line drive enable you to travel through sand and up grades on high gear as slowly as ten miles an hour. That there is no need to rush the hard pulls is one of the charms of driving a Rambler.

not only here but throughout the entire city.

Among the local dealers who have been doing big business during the past week is S. G. Mahan. This is particularly true of his Hudson line, interest in which has been stimulated by the addition of the 1911 types including the open body, runabout, coupe and touring car.

E. P. Brinegar, president of the Pioneer Automobile Company, while in Detroit in attendance at the convention of the Chalmers dealers, wired Mr. C. Eib something of the conditions found there. The telegram reads in part: "Interest in dealers meeting is great with one hundred and twenty dealers attending. Reports show that the city has shipped one hundred and three per cent more cars to date than at this time last year. Agents are buying in such quantities that we cannot get an increase in our allotment."

George P. Moore, Pacific Coast representative of Monogram Oils, has just returned from a business trip to Los Angeles. He reports that trade conditions in the southern end of the state are decidedly bright, showing a decided increase in demand over that of last season. The Los Angeles Show promises to be a tremendous success.

W. M. Phelps, Pacific Coast representative of the Pope Manufacturing Company, is in town, having just come from a visit throughout the northwest. Mr. Phelps reports that the call upon the Pope factory this season by the dealers for Pope Hartford cars has been much greater than in past years.

Along recent deliveries reported by the Consolidated Motor Car Company of Pope-Hartford cars are those to Harry Arnold of Arnold Bros., Sacramento; Dr. T. E. Bailey, Shreve Building, and S. L. Abbot, president of the Security Savings Bank. The cars were all of 1911 model.

That the automobile industry holds out the most attractive career to men of a mechanical turn of mind has just been proven again. J. G. Vincent, superintendent of inventions of the Burroughs Adding Machine Company, has left that field in which he has become almost world-famous, to join the engineering forces of the Hudson Motor Car Company.

According to advices from Detroit, the Chalmers dealers who were recently in convention there, devoted a large part of one day to a tour of inspection of the Morgan & Wright plant, where they saw the most advance method of tire manufacture. After the tour through the immense factory was completed, the dealers were entertained at luncheon by the Morgan & Wright people.

According to a letter just received by the Pioneer Automobile Company from E. P. Brinegar, fun making added much to the recent convention of the Chalmers dealers held in Detroit. The letter was accompanied by a copy of a joke newspaper called "The Chalmers Exhaust" which was distributed in the banquet hall by news boys on the closing night of the convention.

F. H. Kennett Jr. of Los Angeles recently toured up from Los Angeles by the Valley Route, in his Hudson "20" roadster. He made the trip in three days and in spite of the fact that roads were extremely bad had no trouble except one puncture. His speedometer now registers 4,785 miles.

Wasted Energy

He was tall and he was lanky and he was politely inebriated. He pulled solemnly at a dead cigar as he boarded a crowded car at the corner. He leaned limply against the railboard and gazed vacantly out into space over the heads of his fellow passengers. As the car jerked forward he lurched backward and spilled himself between the rails. The conductor gathered him in and anchored him safely to a window bar. He looked around him in a wrinkled perplexity and at last he spoke.

"Collision?" he asked of the small man on whose toes he was standing.

"No, sir," was the reply.

"Whee—wheel broke?" was his next query.

"No, sir," answered the little fellow.

Silence then.

"Explosion?" came the next question.

"No, sir," said the short one.

More silence.

"Smatter, then?" he queried, reluctantly.

"Nothing, sir," meekly returned his victim.

"Nothin' smatter?" he ejaculated with a frown; "if I'd known that I wouldn't get off."

Perverse

Her people thought and so did mine

We were well suited, she and I,

But countering our fair design

She knocked our pretty plans sky high.

She would not, though I coaxed and teased

And begged of her my bride to be;

She said she'd marry whom she pleased,

Yet—goodness knows—she pleases me.

A Leather Covered Road for Auto- mobiles

Would be an ideal condition for the present style of automobile tires. The tires would last almost indefinitely.

WOODWORTH TREADS are tire protectors that give practically this condition. The tread is continually being laid down in front of the tire and taken up behind it. The coil springs that hold it on keep it always snug and close, so that dirt or stones cannot get under the tire, and consequently the tire is always running on a soft, clean leather surface.

The WOODWORTH TREAD is not fastened in any way to the tire rim or spokes; consequently the tire rolls just as freely as on the road, and there is no chafing or heating. We agree to give a new tire in replacement of any tire injured by Woodworth Treads when used as we instruct.

The leather used is especially treated to stand the action of water and dirt, and is closely studded with steel rivets, making the treads suitable for any roads and practically puncture proof. They are also an excellent anti-skid.

They can be easily fitted to any make of tire without taking the tire off the rim. A tag sent with each tread gives full instructions for applying.

They are not expensive. By using them you can cut down your tire cost per mile to less than half, besides doing away with punctures and skidding.

His Appeal to Reason

Fred Warren, editor of the Appeal to Reason, has learned that though reason is the glory of human nature, one of the eminences whereby we are raised above the beasts of the field, it is not always to be appealed to with impunity in this enlightened country of ours. For appealing to reason Mr. Warren is now under sentence to six months hard labor in a Federal penitentiary. The circumstances of his case are peculiar. When the courts held in the case of Moyer, Heywood and Pettibone, who were kidnaped in one State and hustled into another, that it didn't matter how men charged with crime were brought within the jurisdiction of the court so long as they were there Editor Warren dissented from the judicial opinion, but resolved to act on a principle which he believed had been laid down. Presently he issued a proclamation of a reward of a big sum to anyone who would capture and take into the Kentucky jurisdiction ex-Governor Taylor of that State, who then being accused of the murder of Governor Goebel was technically a fugitive from justice. He prepared circulars in the style of those regularly issued by the authorities in such cases made and provided, and submitted copies to a postmaster for approval. They were approved, and then they were sent through the mails, whereupon the editor was arrested for employing the mail service to incite people to violence. His conviction soon followed, and the judgment was recently affirmed. Of course Warren is guilty of a technical violation of the postal laws, but what he did, apparently, was in furtherance of the ends of justice, and therefore his friends are wildly indignant. They assert that what he did was precisely what the courts have pronounced lawful, and they charge the authorities with being prejudiced against him on account of his being the editor of a Socialist paper. Which goes to show that what men want of reason for their opinions they usually make up with their preconceptions. The courts did not decide in the Moyer, Heywood and Pettibone case that the kidnaping of a man accused of crime is lawful, or that it is lawful to incite men to kidnap a citizen. These questions were not involved in the case. The only question involved was whether irregularities in the process by which a fugitive from justice is brought within the jurisdiction of the court can be successfully urged as a bar to his trial. Moyer, Heywood and Pettibone were not lawfully extradited. They were kidnaped. They were given no opportunity to avail themselves of a writ of habeas corpus. Their rights as citizens were infringed. If the method pursued in their case were to be recognized as a good precedent grievous injustice would follow. But there is a remedy for the evil that might be inflicted by this unlawful practice. Now while Editor Warren sought to emphasize the injustice of it he was hardly logical in his method. He offered a reward to whomsoever would do that which under the law is a felony. For the courts have never decided that kidnaping is not a crime.

Tetrazzini at the Fountain

The songs that Tetrazzini gave us at the fountain that Lotta gave us filled many thousands of people with ineffable joy. The occasion was one that thrilled the heart of this cyrenaic city with delight. It made us all feel that in winning so unique, so complimentary a token of a great artist's esteem we had achieved a really fine distinction. But according to a veracious contemporary, more practical than sentimental, the event possessed great intrinsic value inasmuch as it served to advertise our climate. This is a view of the matter that bespeaks a keen commercial instinct and at the same time betrays a lack of imagination which is not unusual in business circles. There is another view to be taken of Tetrazzini's performance not to be despised even by those whose ideals are pigeon-holed in the counting-house. Tetrazzini gave us her songs as Lotta gave us the fountain—as a token of esteem—and we might do well to prize them as symbols of mutual appreciation. If we must appraise them why not consider that they vindicate a certain conception of the City of St. Francis, the conception that in its essence the spirit of this community is a protest against rigid rule and dull conventionality? The truth is that Tetrazzini has made a most valuable contribution to the best sort of local tradition, the tradition that goes back to the days when our fathers showered coins at the twinkling feet of little Lotta Crabtree on the stage of the old Bella Union. Tetrazzini's performance has afforded testimony in corroboration of that which was given by Robert Louis Stevenson in commemoration of whom a modest cenotaph stands in Portsmouth Square where the invalid author bathed himself in the inspiring atmosphere of his curious environment. Tetrazzini has added her voice to the voices of other artists, proclaiming to the world that in this city there is a spirit that appeals to that mysterious imponderable quality which we call the artistic temperament, and that here where there are strong passions and a zeal for life, its pleasures and its activities, we are quick to enter upon terms of intimacy and camaraderie with those favored ones of earth who go about imparting intellectualized emotion. Compared with this spirit, with the strange and subtle lure of the city by the Golden Gate, how inconsequential even from the commercial standpoint is the balmy climate! Instead of felicitating ourselves on the climate rather should we regret that the bond of sympathy between the singer and her vast audience was not put to a test with drenching rain. Had the diva sung her songs beneath a canopy of storm clouds instead of the richly embroidered cloth of serene heaven, more reason there would have been for a mixture of egotism and pride in the rush of emotion with which she swept the epochal multitude of deadheads. If the weather had been in keeping with the season the delicious whimsicality of the occasion would have been greatly enhanced. It goes without saying that dampness would have affected neither the ebullience of the singer nor the enthusiasm of her audience.

The Immorality of Immunity

There has been much lamentation over the exoneration of United States Senator Lorimer, the man who inspired in the immaculate Roosevelt the dread of contamination. Also there has been much cynical comment on the circumstance that where the man who corrupted legislators in behalf of Senator Lorimer has been re-elected to the Illinois Legislature the half-a-dozen men who confessed that they received bribes from him are politically and socially untouchable. To the man of limited reasoning powers and no imagination the outcome of the scandalous affair bespeaks an ugly perversion of justice and serves as a biting comment on the futility of our machinery for regulating public morals. This view of the matter is due partly to a misconception of the facts and partly to a misconception of the principles of morality and justice. There is not one scintilla of evidence to show that Senator Lorimer paid a cent to anybody for the purpose of bribery, and the presumption is neither logical nor legal that the man who prospered in politics from bribery is a bribe-giver. Political machines have often procured office for men by bribery without either knowledge or consent of the persons thus favored. Sometimes they are actuated by love of the man whose election they corruptly aid than by hatred of the man whose defeat is their darling consummation. Political machines are concerned for their own aggrandizement, and it is not unusual for them to spend their own money for corrupt purposes. Colonel Roosevelt himself can conscientiously say that no political machine ever aided him by corrupt means during the whole course of his political career. If he were to say so one might apply to him the short and ugly epithet without the slightest fear of doing him injustice. Not as to the fate of the men who confessed that they received bribes. Surely it is meet that they should be socially and politically untouchable not only because they accepted bribes, but because, actuated by a mean motive, they confessed that they accepted bribes. The consequence of a curious obliquity of moral vision some of our prominent publicists have come to regard the confession of a contemptible bribe-taker as an act of patriotism that compels absolution. They conceive the immunity bath to be something akin to a solemn religious ceremony by which the stain of sin is washed away. No the immunity bath when offered to faithless public servants is a species of temptation as cruel as it is despicable. It is a temptation that tends to induce a scoundrel to extinguish the last vestige of his self-respect. For there is no pretense of penitence in a self-confessed bribe-taker; no spiritual metamorphosis is wrought in him when he takes to the immunity bath. Too cowardly to endure just punishment, sensitive only to what is conducive to his own welfare, he takes the flesh of another that his own hide may go unscarred. His original crime, the result of human frailty, we can ponder more in sorrow than in anger; but the supplementary crime of the ruthless, selfish and cowardly informer is an excitant only of contempt and disgust. Of officials who employ the immunity bath as an aid to justice we have no criticism to make. Our sympathy is with every official who does his duty according to his lights—even with the hangman. In certain circumstances the immunity bath is a legitimate aid to justice, but the experience of half a dozen cities seems to warrant the conclusion that it is a futile expedient when employed for the benefit of such rascals as those who caused the revolt of sentiment in Illinois to which may be attributed the re-election of the man justly accused of bribery. And it is not to the discredit of human nature that such is the case. For whatever may be the hard-and-fast rules of evidence and principles of law, abhorrent is the idea of convicting a man on the testimony of impenitent grafters procured by official bribery.

Freedom for the Anarchist

Some time ago when Editor Hearst exerted us to acclaim the new republic of Portugal we suggested that as such expression of felicitation might be premature it would be well to pause for developments. We observed that forms of government were of no consequence, and that it remained to be seen whether the people were to derive from the revolution substantial benefits, such as greater freedom and prosperity. Less than three months have passed since the royal family hastened to foreign parts, but the character of the new government has taken shape, and expression has been given to the spirit of it. The form is republican, but the spirit is that of a despotism. Something of the true state of affairs may be learned from Francisco Christo, editor of the Povo de Aveiro. He is a republican, his paper was opposed to the royal family; far from being a clericalist or Roman Catholic, he is not even a Christian. He tells us that Theophile Braga, the President, who has been pronounced a great patriot by Mr. Hearst and other impulsive journalists, brought about the revolution with the assistance of the Mafia, the Camorra and other anarchical secret societies which had debauched the common soldier and taught him it was a glorious thing to murder the officers of his regiment. In the reign of Dom Manoel though Senhor Christo refused to flatter the king he was allowed to say practically what he liked. Now that he has refused also to flatter the Republic he has been thrown into jail, and his paper has been suppressed. According to a writer in the London Saturday Review, the press of Portugal was far freer under King Manoel than it is now. Today a censorship is exercised not only on Portuguese papers but also on foreign correspondence. "I can personally testify," says the Saturday Review man, "that, generally speaking, the censorship is ten times worse than in Russia." The policy of the Government, he tells us, is the policy of revenge. The only papers that are given full swing are two semi-official organs "which are both of the deepest shade of yellow and have both distinguished themselves by publishing the filthiest attacks on the nuns, attacks which the Jewish and anti-clerical editor of the 'Nation' investigated on the spot and declared to be 'abominable falsehoods.'" The correspondent reports also that one day the inside pages of all the English papers that reached the Avenida Palace Hotel had been removed because, though on the whole friendly, they did not praise the republicans for their heroic onslaught some days before on the convent school girls. The correspondence from which we quote is the beginning of a series of letters, the writer of which says he is worried by the thought that before he has time to prophesy the fate of the republic that fate will already have overtaken it. Forty thousand men are on strike and the Government confesses that the military cannot be depended upon to enforce measures against the strikers. The correspondent concludes: "Freedom in Portugal means that the anarchist alone is free." So it certainly appears that Mr. Hearst was a little premature with his felicitations and his appeal for applause.

The Futility of Reform

A contemporary informs us that one of the most important subjects to be considered by the legislature of 1911 is the reformation of the criminal law. This is indeed a most important subject. The criminal law has many defects. There is much room for improvement. But the legislature will not greatly improve the quality of justice by merely reforming the law. What is of much more importance than the reformation of the law is the correction of abuses in the administration of justice. There will always be miscarriage of justice while we have trial judges as stupid as they are perverse. To these two characteristics is attributable much of what goes wrong in our courts. The other day, for example, the Court of Appeal set aside two verdicts rendered in Judge Dunne's court for the reason, in one case, that the defendant was convicted of embezzling property, which, the evidence showed, was not in his possession but which had been misappropriated by another person who had confessed his guilt; in the other case for the reason that the trial judge had virtually infringed on the prerogative of the jury. Now here we have two miscarriages of justice that are not to be attributed to any defect in the law. We perceive in these cases the mischievous, typical working of the personal equation against which it is impossible to guard. It is not impossible however for the legislature to improve the personal equation of the bench. This may be done by occasional impeachment proceedings, for the law with all its imperfections takes cognizance of the fact that an ass in ermine is as undesirable as a knave in the livery of Justice.

Varied Types

II—GIUSEPPE CADENASSO

By Edward F. O'Day

Just to catch a glimpse of him, with his thick silver hair parted in the middle, his fine brown eyes, his strong nose and his sensitive lips that smile beneath a gray mustache, is to know him for an artist. He has a strong face, has Giuseppe Cadenasso of San Francisco, and a vigorous frame that tells of strength to the ends of his spatulate fingers; yet is there apparent in him, particularly when one converses with him, that feminine element which has nothing whatever to do with effeminacy, but is essential to the makeup of the artist.

Was it reserve or something of this attribute which caused him, for instance, to evade, very gracefully and with a smile, the question of his year of birth? He will tell you that he is going down hill, but it is a form of words; he knows that he carries a lighter burden of age than many younger men. But just the same he evaded that question of the exact year.

Genoa was Cadenasso's native place and he came to San Francisco when he was nine years old, poor but ambitious, ill-educated but aimful, a timid alien burning with a fire that some call the divine fire of genius but about which Cadenasso, shrugging his shoulders, professes to know naught except that it must be stoked with hard work.

Hard work was his portion for all those early years; not the hard work of the studio which is his life work and will only cease when his last picture is painted and his last tube twisted and dry, but the hard toil that buys bread and keeps out the cold. He did odd jobs in the city; he did chores in the country. And always in his leisure moments he was busy with a bit of chalk or a pencil.

Always full of energy he worked just as hard at his recreation as at his tasks and at the proper moment that curious interposition of providence or destiny or luck—call it what you will, it is to be traced in nearly all our lives—placed him in the line of his vocation. With his crayons he had covered the blank walls of a room in his uncle's house with ships and figures and landscapes when a great artist of those early San Francisco days happened along to observe his work. It was Jules Tavernier. He recognized the boy's talent and in that indirect way which is the most potent means of communication between kindred souls, he encouraged him to persevere.

That the boy had a lot to learn may be inferred from the course he pursued immediately after making Tavernier's acquaintance. He went to work for a fresco painter. It was hardly the place to learn art, but there were brushes to be handled and colors to be dabbled and he liked it. Then he was fired. Perhaps we might trace here the incongruity of the artistic temperament and base commercial limitations, but the fine-spun fashionable theory would not appeal to Cadenasso. He would be the first to say that he was fired because his work was unsatisfactory, not because it was too good. For a time he was plunged into the depths of despondency, but the reaction came when he found work making crayon enlargements of photographs. There was a vogue of those enlargements in San Francisco, as any curious person may learn by inspecting old-fashioned parlors which survived the fire. Some of the enlargements in the heavy gilt frames that surmount the fireplace may be Cadenasso's work.

With the money thus earned Cadenasso paid for his tuition at the San Francisco Art Association which had its rooms in Pine street over the California Market. There he met Arthur Mathews and the meeting was only second in importance to his meeting with Jules Tavernier. He admired Mathews and was afraid of him, for A bas-relief by Haig Patigian.

Mathews had the stern front and the cutting tongue of the teacher. "When he said your work was rotten, you knew it was rotten," says Cadenasso with a smile. It was the proper influence for an eager boy and Cadenasso realizes the value of that early discipline. When he speaks of Mathews he uses superlatives.

Painting assiduously Cadenasso was yet afraid to exhibit. He had to overcome that shyness about his own compositions which is a trait of the sensitive youth and makes him blush when his composition is read to the class by his teacher. Finally a mute student named Redmond insisted that Cadenasso put his work on view and in great trepidation he submitted his best pictures to Secretary Martin. Martin showed the pictures to Yelland, the marine painter, and Yelland thought so much of them that he bade his pupils admire them which, after the fashion of pupils the world over, they undoubtedly did. So Cadenasso exhibited. It was a great impulse to renewed effort, but it was somewhat dampened on varnishing day when he needed a ladder of twenty steps to reach his canvases. That was heart-breaking, of course, but like all men with the stuff of success in their bosoms, Cadenasso has had his heart broken time and time again without succumbing.

Gradually he began to achieve. His paintings attracted attention. Slowly but surely, at the exhibitions, they came down from the ceiling until they reached prominent position on the line. There came the rapture of the first sale, the dignity of the first small studio all his own Cadenasso had arrived. He sold pictures to the wealthy men and women of this and other cities of America; some of his works even went to Paris. Connoisseurs of great fame are proud to possess them.

Since he left Genoa a boy of nine years Cadenasso has not been abroad. For years he could not afford to make the expensive trip and today—who knows?—artists are rarely rich. There was a time when he was glad of the opportunity to go as far into the heart of nature as one may travel in Golden Gate Park. Our hills, our ocean beach, the flats and sloughs within an hour's journey have given him the inspiration which others have sought in France, in Italy, in the Netherlands. And he is far from sorry that this is so. For there is nothing imitative in Cadenasso's work. There is no trace of Corot or Diaz or Constable or Turner in his canvases. If he had gone abroad the influence of these and the schools would have been almost unavoidable. He would have ceased to be Cadenasso of San Francisco.

Originality is the keynote of Cadenasso's landscapes. He has never unlearned the priceless lesson, never surrendered the invaluable gift of looking at nature with his own eyes. What he sees is not what other painters see; most decidedly it is not the workaday spectacle which the inartistic see. It is nature transfigured by the Cadenasso personality and that is the personality of a nature-lover. He cares nothing for portrait painting. It is drudgery, he says; the word may be reminiscent of those old days when he enlarged photographs in crayon.

Of course Cadenasso has a theory of art—theory of work would better express it. You must study, he says; you must apply yourself; you must choose your path and keep everlasting at it till you have followed it to the end—and you will reach the end of your chosen path only when you can work no more. Genius means hard work in his vocabulary and sincerity spells success. He doesn't believe in Bohemianism or in cliques. There are no incense dreams, no solemn darkneses, no lazy wooings of inspiration in his studio days. No music of gongs summons his color visions to the inward eye. The stimulus of alcohol and nicotine has nothing to do with his art. "Go to bed early and arise with a clear eye if you would see Nature," says Giuseppe Cadenasso.

A fashionable photographer has undoubtedly attained the pinnacle of tactful achievement. A woman with a decided squint came to him for a photograph.

"Will you permit me," he said promptly, "to take your portrait in profile? There is a certain shyness about one of your eyes which is as difficult in art as it is fascinating in nature."

Being a Brief Chronicle of Significant Events the Wide World Over.

By Robert McTavish

Did Teddy Plagiarize?

It is the general opinion that "the square deal" was one of the most felicitous phrases coined by Colonel Roosevelt, but it now appears that he did not coin it at all, but merely popularized it. Governor-elect Dix of New York claims the credit for putting the phrase at the disposal of Teddy. At dinner a few nights ago the new governor seemed reminiscent and among other things told how, during Governor Roosevelt's term, he was called upon to present the photographs of the State's chief executive to a historical society. Mr. Dix said that he vainly asked Governor Roosevelt by letter for a photograph inscribed with a suitable motto, and finally went to him personally for it. "What shall I write?" Governor Roosevelt asked. "Write what I dictate," replied Mr. Dix; and he dictated, "To every man a square deal." It was an inspiration to Teddy as he put it away in his memory for future use.

One-Cent School Lunches

The Chicago Board of Education has started supplying the children of one of the big schools in the congested Italian quarter with one-cent lunches. The lunches consist of a sandwich an inch and a half thick with jam between the slices, a bowl of milk and a small piece of candy. This is not much of a lunch, but it is probably as much as can be provided for one cent, and there is no doubt that it appeals to the school children. On the first day two hundred children were supplied and five hundred had to be turned away. Whether the children will continue to patronize the lunch center when the novelty wears off and the fare becomes monotonous remains to be seen.

It Tells a Story

When the President tells a story everybody wants to hear it, not so much because the President is expected to tell a new story or an irresistibly funny one, but merely because there is a general curiosity to learn what sort of stories are in the mind of the President and are deemed worthy of repetition. When William Ragg Holt, the reporter of the Daily Mail who was detailed to "do" America in thirty-eight hours went to the White House the President sprang a yarn on him. It was about an Englishman who complained to an American waiter about the tastelessness of our oysters. The waiter replied: "Wait till you strike a bad one, mister, all you'll get all the taste you want." I don't know whether Ragg Holt laughed at that or not. I certainly isn't much of a story. I'd rather hear one of Lincoln's.

The Osteopathic Goose

The following yarn taken from the Oroville Mercury is reprinted to show that the Mercury is a Chico correspondent who is wasting his talents in the Sacramento Valley. He ought to press agent for a medicine man. Chico, Dec. 17.—An osteopath goose was killed today on the Phelan ranch by G. U. Graham. The bird's last act in this world was to cure N. MacDonald of a bad case of rheumatism. The case is a peculiar one, and has attracted the attention of local physicians. Graham was driving along the road. A few yards ahead of him MacDonald, bent nearly double with rheumatic pains, was hobbling slowly along, leaning heavily on a cane. There was a dense fog, and geese were flying low. Graham shot at a flock from his buggy. One of the birds dropped from the band, struggling along a short distance, and then fell swiftly towards the earth. It landed on the back of MacDonald's neck. MacDonald straightened up and ran off at top speed. Then he stopped in astonishment. He was as free from rheumatism as a healthy baby. Doctors say there are cases on record where fear and shock combined have cured rheumatism. They think this may be one of those cases. Some, however, express the opinion, working on the osteopathic principle, that the falling goose struck just the right vertebra in the spinal column to effect a cure.

Weighty Deliberations in Congress

An idea of the nonsense which is sometimes indulged in by our representatives in Congress who might be better employed, is given by the following excerpt from the Congressional Record anent the maintenance of six bath rooms at a public cost of $4,000. Here is part of the two-hour debate:

Mr. Mann of Illinois—Why not cut it off entirely? What is the use of having baths?

Mr. Morse—If the gentleman from Chicago can get along without a bath—

Mr. Mann—Evidently the gentleman from Wisconsin does.

Mr. Morse—If the gentleman from Chicago can get along without baths it is perfectly proper to cut them out. The gentleman from Wisconsin cannot, and therefore is not in favor of cutting them out entirely.

Mr. Mann—The question is: Is the next House going to take baths? (Laughter.)

Mr. Campbell (Kansas)—The great unwashed are in for the next Congress and will have no use for bath rooms.

Mr. Mann—There are four men provided for the bath room over there. There are a large number of bath tubs and they are almost constantly in use. Those members of the House who do not take baths ought not to be too critical of those who take them. (Laughter.)

Mr. Campbell—Some members of the House take baths where they live, at seasonable hours of the day.

Mr. Mann—And at seasonable seasons of the year.

Mr. Rucker (of Colorado)—Gentlemen have not forgotten that a great number of members on the Republican side of the House took a bath when they went up Salt River on the eighth of November.

The High Brow in Fresno

Chester H. Rowell, the editor of the Fresno Republican, is the greatest high brow in the San Joaquin Valley. His editorials are so learned that college professors cut them out and paste them in their scrap books for future use in magazine articles. Rowell throws off this sort of thing with a careless turn of his wrist (he is talking of our mixed American civilization):

"We sent a Japanese murderer to San Quentin last week, escorted by an Anglo-Saxon shirereve. He had been convicted by an Anglo-Saxon gemod, known to us by the Norman name of juree. He had been arrested by the Norman constable of an Anglo-Saxon tunskap; incarcerated in the Norman donjon of an Anglo-Saxon gaol; and sentenced by the Norman juge of a Norman comtee and the Normans' themselves, French though they spoke, were Norskmannen, of the same Viking breed as Hengest and Horsa, who had already invaded England centuries before Guillaume le Conquerant led his Frenchified Norsemen into Angleland. When a negro whose ancestors our ancestors stole from the Conjo jungle, to be a Saxon thrall, gets drunk on Anglo-Saxon beer, the Norman mareshalc of the Saxon tun throws him into the Portuguese calobozo. If he, following the customs of his ancestors, slays his rival tribesman, he does it with a Norman raseur, and a Saxon hencman hangs him from a Saxon gollows.

Fresno's Inflexible Moralists

Fresno has just been treated to a Kirmess which proved an artistic as well as a financial success. Naturally Fresno was delighted. Still greater delight, however, was afforded to those Fresnoites who love to study human nature by a sideshow in connection with the amateur theatricals. When pictures of the various groups of men and women who had been selected to appear in the Kirmess were published in the Fresno papers there was a terrific hubbub in the Ministerial Union of Fresno. The Ministerial Union, it appears, consists of clergymen who if they had lived in the time of the Puritans would have objected to bear-baiting, not because it gave pain to the bear but because it afforded pleasure to the spectators. Living in the more enlightened twentieth century they whereased and resolved against the Kirmess and called upon the estimable ladies of the Parlor Lecture Club, under whose auspices it was to be held, to abandon it and substitute some godly form of entertainment. As the ladies of the Parlor Lecture Club paid no attention to this extraordinary demand, the Ministerial Union met in special session and summoned the ladies to appear before them and offer defense for their conduct. The ladies replied that they had nothing to defend, that they would certainly not honor the summons and that they would be pleased to have the Ministerial Union attend their dress rehearsal. In solemn conclave the Ministerial Union chose three members to attend and fortified them with all sorts of spiritual weapons to resist the attacks of whatever demons might lurk in the midst of the merry Kirmessers. But the ministers arrived when the rehearsal was over, thus saving their immortal souls from contamination. They exhorted the ladies to give up the Kirmess idea, but the ladies—God bless them—stood pat. And what did the ministers do? Did they launch excommunication at the heads of the recalcitrant ladies? Did they hurl a general anathema at the Kirmessers? Did they ban the entertainment and threaten hellfire to all who should attend? Not on your life! They exacted from the ladies a promise not to divulge their names to the newspapers and gave up the field.

Fiorella

By Renato Fucini (From the Italian)

While crossing the back of the mountain which, detaching itself from the Alps at Serravalle, sweeps away and finally loses itself in gentle slopes in the narrow gorge of the Gonfolina near Sergia, the cautious alpinist who does not aspire to the glories of the chamois may find the most stupendous pictures, by which Dame Nature has rendered so rich and so melancholy the poetry of our undulating Tuscan hills.

The peak upon which the town of Sant' Allucio rises is certainly the most picturesque of Monte Albano; and I am vexed that our alpinists should have omitted it from their itinerary, pointing out instead the neighboring summit of Pietra Marina, very beautiful, too, but without doubt yielding the palm to my favorite, although it rises about a hundred meters higher above the sea-level.

The first time I went up there my eyes were almost dazzled, and for a few minutes, bewitched by the marvelous spectacle before me, I could do nothing but gaze around astonished, without being able to distinguish anything definite in the wide, green horizon. But the first stupefaction having passed somewhat, I perceived near me a fair little girl of about twelve, dressed in her poor shepherdess costume, who, coming towards me with a little bunch of violets, stopped at two paces, distance, and, without raising her eyes, through shyness, said to me:

"Would you like them?"

"My dear little girl, certainly I will have them! Thank you," said I, caressing her cheek. "Did you pick them yourself?"

"Si, signore."

"What did you pick them for?"

"For you."

"For me! But do you know me?"

"No, signore."

"How did such a good idea come to you, then?"

She lowered her smiling eyes still more, and fiddling with a corner of her apron, looked towards a tuft of hornbeams not far off, and answered:

"He told me to!"

I turned too in the same direction and saw the lively face of a young boy appear among the branches, who from beneath his shabby hat of gray cloth smiled timidly and yet maliciously at me.

When the little girl saw her companion appear, she called to him:

"What are you shy about, stupid? Come out!"

The boy approached us very slowly, holding his hat in his hand and gnawing a twig of broom.

"What are you doing up here alone, you little rascals, hidden away among the tufts of hornbeams?" I said to them, half serious, half joking. They looked at each other and burst out laughing.

"Ah! you laugh, do you?"

A louder laugh than the first followed.

"I am going now to teach you to laugh in the face of respectable folks, you bag of rubbish!" And so saying I began to run after the boy who fled away in alarm, jumping among the broom brushes like a deer, and shouting:

"You won't get me, anyway!"

And he did not stop until he saw I had given up the chase.

When I returned to the little girl I found her crying.

"What! you are crying!" I said to her. "Didn't you see, little goose, that I was doing it for fun? But did you really think I would have hurt him? Come, come, stop crying and tell me instead what your name is."

"Fiore—ella."

"Come, come, my poor little Fiorelluccia, be good, and buy some biscuits with this on Sunday morning when you go to mass. Tell me what is his name?"

"Pipetta."

"Pipetta must be his pet name; I want to know his real name: what is he called?"

"I don't know, they all call him Pipetta." And she raised her eyes, which were still wet with tears but drying fast.

"Ah! you are laughing! So we have made peace, then?"

"Yes."

"Oh, brava! Those fine sparkling eyes please me more now! My good Pipetta," I said to the boy, "we have made peace; if you will make it up, too, come back here and I will give you also something to buy biscuits with, if you will do me a little favor."

The idea of the biscuits tamed him at once, and he came running to me.

"Do you know if there is any fountain near here?"

"Si, signore; there is one just down there, and isn't it good, too?"

"Here, fill this leather cup and bring it back to me."

Pipetta, who was immensely pleased at being so trusted, ran off, leaping and racing, to get the water; and he went to and fro on the same journey several times and gay as could be, for the aniseed, which I kept in a little flask that I had slung round my neck, and which turned the water a bluish color when thrown into it, pleased my small new friends so much that they did not cease asking me for it and drinking from it with childish greed until it was empty.

We sat down together on the grass, and after a short time the most frank and cordial confidences were exchanged among us. They sang songs in their silvery voices; pointed out to me Prato and Pistoia, which looked as distinct as the thicker clumps of daisies do in the midst of a wide meadow; and showed me where lay the distant sea behind our backs, asking me if it were true that it was so much larger than the ponds of Poggio a Caiano. They then indicated to me the Appenines on which Pipetta was born, and low down below us the houses where they lived now, sunk in the shade of a narrow glen, near which a mill was working, sending up to us the fresh swirling noise of its wheel.

I had to promise Pipetta that I would return in September to pay him a visit while shooting, and he told me he knew of many coveys of woodcock which he would show me. Fiorella told me that there were many hares and foxes. A short time after, when a bell at Bacchereto struck twelve, my friends left me in a great hurry, running down the mountain rocks, and I could not move until the sound of their calling and whistling to collect the sheep which were scattered about the grassy slopes of the wood was lost in the distance.

"They are happy, poor children!" I thought to myself, giving a last look at the greenish roofs of their homes which lay cuddled among the elder-trees. "They are happy!" And repeating these words in my mind, I returned slowly home, conversing gaily with good Ciaccio, who, observing my good humor, entirely forgot his gravity as royal pointer, and as long as daylight lasted did nothing else the whole way but point at lizards and look joyfully at me and at the larks which fluttered trilling from the lupin fields bordering the road.

The promises made were punctually kept by both parties, and I soon fell into the habit going to shoot in those parts, to which I was attracted by the relative abundance of game, liking for those two giddy little rogues.

Every time they perceived me from afar, they ran to meet me. Good Pipetta showed me woodcock coveys and watched them for me while I stalked them; Fiorella, full of content, stayed near some fountain to arrange a seat of stone for us all to sit on for marena (our light freshments) and to get a fire ready to roast chestnuts.

My visits to these young friends were frequent in the autumn, but rarely during the other seasons. I did I see them or have news of them; so the years passed swiftly, and soon the two young imps had become maiden and young man, both lithe, robust and beautiful. In time I noticed something else as well. The germs of a savage love, born and developed in those solitudes, where such a passion is manifested in all creatures the form of sorrow—from the lark which suspended like a gold speck in the high regions the air, sings his morning trills, to the solitary sparrow which laments in the hole of a cliff, the savage love had given to their eyes an expression of ineffable melancholy. Their gay songs ceased; at my arrival they no longer ran joyfully to welcome me, and I generally found them sitting motionless and silent at some distance apart from each other.

"Fiorella, you are in love!" I said to her one evening, when she had in vain tried to hide from me her anxiety at the late return of her friend from some neighboring house. She blushed as a pomegranate blossom, and ran off to look at a straying kid which she heard bleating in the distance.

One August morning, while I was resting beneath an oak tree, Pipetta sat down by my side and taking one of my hands in his own which trembled, he confessed to me that he was in love with Fiorella and asked me whether he would well to marry her.

"If you feel willing and strong enough to provide for the needs of a family," said I, "you should certainly; and you would do right, for Fiorella is a good girl and is fond of you, and—and Fiorella can be no one else's wife in short—you understand me? And is your family pleased?"

"Are they pleased? Only too pleased! Our people have given me to understand that I do not buy twenty-five more sheep, they will not give her to me."

"If that is all the trouble," I said in a low voice, "it can be remedied."

At these words Pipetta seemed to give me a caress with his eyes. He remained silent a few minutes, and then continued:

"There is another obstacle—and a very big one!"

"What is it?" I asked.

"I am liable to military service. Fiorella knows this, but she does not know that I have drawn lots and that one of these days I shall get a notice to present myself for the medical inspection. I don't know what has happened, but they told me

Nonsense About Tetrizzini

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Madame Tetrizzini is certainly deserving of our appreciation and warm esteem. We all feel that she is a very sweet and gracious woman, and that what she did for us entitles her to our lasting gratitude and affection. But there is no necessity of indulging in misrepresentation to heighten the glory of her performance. Our newspapers seem to be of the opinion that to appreciate that performance we must be convinced that it was a most hazardous undertaking. They tell us that she hazarded her priceless voice when she sang for us in the open air. This is sheer nonsense. Her voice was not in any greater danger than it is when she walks abroad. She might have caught cold but she is subject to that affliction at all times and never so much so as when she sings in a place like the Dreamland Rink when it is packed with people and reeking with the effluvia of perspiring mortals. As to the possibility of her "straining" her voice of course that too is nonsense. No person who has mastered the art of song, who knows how to produce tones, is ever in danger either in the open air or in a room of injuring any part of the apparatus by which we vocalize. When the voice of a scientific singer is impaired it is because of some physical weakness, the result either of age or general debility.

The Land Fraud Cases

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I see that the last chapter in the Oregon land fraud cases has been brought to a close by Mr. Francis J. Heney. I see also that some seventy odd indictments dismissed on his motion were in cases in which there was no evidence against the accused. But I have seen no comment on the significance of the wind-up of this wholesale persecution. I have seen no attempt to characterize the conduct of Mr. Heney. Apparently he is pursuing the somewhat uneven tenor of his way in good standing among a certain class of reformers who pride themselves on their respectability. I have no doubt that there are many men who despise Abe Ruef, who abhor grafters generally, to whom Francis J. Heney is still persona grata. And yet the facts of his career are plain enough. From the most cursory study of these facts anyone who is not absolutely feeble-minded can perceive that Mr. Heney has no acute sense of the ethics of his profession or the principles of right conduct. The facts briefly are that vested with all the power that the Department of Justice of this great nation can bestow he went into Oregon and employed the machinery of justice without scruple to bring disgrace and ignominy on scores of families. Mr. Heney very well knew that he had no right to procure the indictment of men of whose guilt he had not sufficient evidence to justify him in prosecuting them in open court. The fact is that he used the indictment as an instrument of torture to compel men to give testimony that might enable him to prosecute certain criminals. In other words men were indicted on his ipse dixit for no other reason than that owing to their connections there was a possibility of their knowing something of value to the Government which might be extorted from them. And, as I have said, the man guilty of this ugly enormity is today going about on terms of intimacy with persons who abhor certain kinds of crime and think themselves respectable!

The Spectator

As to the Panama Exposition

It would require the wisdom of Solomon to reconcile the conflicting statements made by the California boosters who have returned from Washington. These gentlemen represent all shades of optimism from the brightest to the most neutral tint. They are unanimous in telling the newspaper interviewers that San Francisco is going to get the fair. But when they attempt to describe the situation in the national capital their statements are widely at variance. It is quite apparent that the attitude of Congress toward the claims and arguments of San Francisco must be susceptible of diverse explanations. It looks as though our returned boosters are puzzled what to think, but dare not admit this uncertain state of mind. One booster explains that the difficulty centers in the Senate; another, that our efforts must be focussed on the House of Representatives, the Senate having been already given over to our cause. One booster declares that the financial argument has practically settled the matter; another thinks that the best New Orleans can expect is a compromise by which the "lakes to the gulf waterway" scheme will be passed. There has been no statement as to the actual number of lawmakers who favor San Francisco; nothing to indicate that a poll has been taken. As a matter of fact, we have only a general pronouncement that San Francisco is to get the fair—nothing more. It looks as though we will know nothing more until the House of Representatives votes on the matter the middle of January.

told me some things which I had not heard before. He said that he did not think that the matter would be decided at this session of Congress for the reason that, while a vote would be had in the lower chamber, it was the announced intention of the friends of New Orleans in the Senate to conduct a filibuster which would put the question over until the Congress is reorganized. He said that while Speaker Cannon is favorable but lukewarm toward San Francisco and President Taft frankly on the fence, Speaker-to-be Champ Clark is aggressively working for New Orleans, making deals and alliances with doubtful members and using his championship of New Orleans as a club to beat recalcitrants into line for his legislative program. This being the case, my informant asked: "What will happen if the vote is not taken till the next Congress convenes?" But just to show that he was not without optimism he added that there was one course which could hardly fail to win San Francisco the indorsement for which she is battling. Let her go before Congress, he advised, explain that she has raised $17,500,000 and intends to increase this to $20,000,000; let her announce that she intends to hold a fair with or without Congressional indorsement and whether New Orleans holds one or not; and then let her ask for the indorsement of Congress merely as a sign to the world of the honesty of her intentions. This would eliminate the idea of a contest with another city and would leave Congress free to do what it wanted for New Orleans; and this may be the course adopted in the end.

fair project were abandoned how would this expense money be apportioned among the subscribers to the exposition fund? That is a ticklish question. The boosters answer it by asseverating that the fair project will never be abandoned, that San Francisco will have an exposition, "ruat coelum." Another interesting question is, Who will be the director-general? So far I have heard the names of four members of the boosting committee mentioned for that large honor: M. H. De Young, James McNab, Reuben Hale and Frank L. Brown.

In the Enemy's Country

I have just received a letter from a well-known San Franciscan sojourning in New Orleans who supplies some very interesting particulars about the attitude of the people of the lagniappe town. "When I arrived in New Orleans and was known for a San Franciscan," he writes, "I was assured that San Francisco had no chance of getting the

An Expensive Campaign

By the way, I have been informed that the boosting campaign has cost up to date in round numbers $100,000. The force of men and women employed in this city has been large and expensive and the trip of the boosters cost a pretty penny. The Californians rented the most desirable apartments in the New Willard. If the Fair, although a certain Mr. Kahn was making a great deal of trouble for New Orleans. In all the show windows they display a map of North America with the Rocky Mountains piled to tremendous heights in stucco. A bright electric light calls attention to New Orleans, "the logical point." And where does San Francisco come in? The map makes it look as inaccessible and desolate as the dreary spot at the North Pole where Doc Cook says he planted the American flag. And those Rocky Mountains! Why, a trip to the moon (barring a musical comedy trip) would be easier than getting over those mountains from a New Orleans 'logical point' of view. The people are great on argument in support of this 'logical point' business, but are somewhat subdued when you mention the mosquito netting in the bedrooms and the electric fans required in the theaters to cool the insufferably hot audiences. Finally they admit that the fair boom was started by real estate men to boost realty values."

Sly, the Builder

As I have frequently observed in these columns, the daily newspapers of San Francisco are so deferential to organized labor that they never publish any news of a nature disagreeable to the unions. Some interesting proof of this fact is to be found in their attitude toward Lucien Sly, a builder, whom the Building Trades have been trying to coerce ever since the fire. Sly is one of our most prosperous builders. He has put up more buildings since the fire than any other man in San Francisco; he has employed more labor than any other builder, and all his work has been done on the open-shop principle, which, considering how organized labor is entrenched in this city, is a fact so remarkable as to call for wonder and astonishment. The mere statement of the fact is sufficient to indicate that Mr. Sly is no ordinary individual. Yet he is unknown to the readers of our daily papers. They have never heard of the incessant struggle that he has had with organized labor, of the assaults that have been made on his men, of the petty persecutions that he has suffered not only from walking delegates but from the authorities of this free and liberty-loving American city. No, the newspapers have deemed it expedient to take no notice of Mr. Sly or his affairs.

The Ways of the Unions

Though I am not certain as to what constitutes a leading citizen I am of the opinion that whatever it is Mr. Sly fills the bill. In his young days he was a cowboy, and on the plains he developed the nerve which he has shown to good advantage in this city both in his business ventures and in his defiance of organized labor. His business is that of buying real estate, improving it and selling it. Since the fire he has built seven large apartment houses. The five-story brick building at the southeast corner of Bush and Leavenworth containing one hundred and twenty-five apartments was built by Sly. It was built on the open-shop principle. The building on the site of the old Berkshire on the west side of Jones between Post and Sutter, which has one hundred and fifty apartments, was built in defiance of the unions; also the apartment house on the south line of O'Farrell between Jones and Leavenworth; also the apartment house on the north line of Turk, east of Van Ness; also the apartment house on the north line of Pacific avenue, east of Van Ness; also the apartment house on the north line of California, east of Jones. Sly has been annoyed by the unions from the first day that he began operations. His men have been attacked and beaten; he has been arrested on warrants charging him with obstructing the street while builders everywhere were vouchsafed permission to violate the ordinance; he has sometimes found it extremely difficult to obtain material owing to the intimidation of merchants; in short no means of harassing him has been neglected, but never for a moment have the unions exhausted his patience or weakened his resolution.

The Authorities Take a Hand

When the unions found that Sly was not to be persecuted into submission by the usual methods they threatened to drive him out of business by making it impossible for him to get necessary action in official circles. One day he submitted plans of a building to the Board of Public Works for approval. The city architects were so busy that they could not find time to examine the plans. Days passed and Sly waited patiently for the approval of his plans. He made frequent visits to the architect's office and found there was "nothing doing." Then he employed a lawyer and served notice on the officials of the Board of Public Works that they were to be sued for $100 damages for each day of delay. And the plans came back. On the completion of the building Sly was notified by one of our public servants that the electric work was all wrong, and that he must tear out the whole installation. For awhile he was in a dilemma. He knew that he had complied strictly with the law, but how was he to get the work approved? Presently it occurred to him that it might be well to have the work examined by the engineer of the Board of Underwriters. He did so. This engineer who had framed the rules by which the city authorities were guided pronounced the work first class. Once more suit was threatened, and once more the authorities "came through." The whole story of Sly's experience would fill many pages, but enough has been told to show that an American citizen may still avail himself of his rights in San Francisco provided he has the courage to battle for them. Sly, it may be interesting to know, has not been harassed since the dynamiting of the Times' building in Los Angeles.

In Defense of Phryne

From that queer storehouse of predigested science, reformed history and sensationalized scandal, the Sunday supplement of the Examiner,

I learn that a French historian by the name Paul Girard has been proving to his own satisfaction and to the satisfaction of the Sunday supplement editor that Phryne, the beautiful courtesan, did not unveil her charms to judges to save herself from death. I am not interested in Paul Girard, but I am interested in Phryne and if only to justify that wonderful painting by Gerome in which the incident has been immortalized, I am going to give my reasons for believing that the incident actually occurred. My authority is that wise old Greek Athenian who wrote the Deipnosophists or Banquet of the Learned. This is what he says: "Now Phryne was a native of Thespiae; and being prosecuted by Euthias on a capital charge, she was acquitted; on which account Euthias was so indignant that he never instituted any prosecutions afterwards, as Hermippus tells us. But Hyperid when pleading Phryne's cause, as he did not succeed at all, but it was plain that the judges were about to condemn her, brought her for into the middle of the court, and, tearing off her tunic and displaying her naked bosom, employed all the end of his speech, with the highest oratorical art, to excite the pity of her judges by the sight of her beauty, and inspired the judges with a superstitious fear, so that they were so moved by pity as not to be able to state the idea of condemning to death 'a prophetic and priestess of Venus.' And when she was acquitted, a decree was drawn up in the following form: 'That hereafter no orator should endeavor to excite pity on behalf of any one, and that no man or woman, when impeached, should have his or her case decided on while present.'"

The Modesty of Phryne

From the supplement editor I learn that Paul Girard makes the argument that Phryne was too modest to employ the expedient of undraping her body in public, even to save her life. I am willing to admit that Phryne may have been modest as other hetairas of her beauty and station, but I will go no farther and I must again reinforce my position by a quotation from good old Athenaeus: "But Phryne was a really beautiful woman, even in those parts of her person which were not generally seen; on which a count it was not easy to see her naked; for she used to wear a tunic which covered her whole person, and she never used the public baths. But on the solemn assembly of the Eleusinian festival, and on the feast of the Posidonia, then she laid aside her garments in the sight of all the assembled Greeks, and having undone her hair, she went to bathe in the sea. And it was from her that Apelles took his picture of the Venus Anadyomene; and Praxiteles the statuary, who was a lover of hers, modelled the Cnidian Venus from her body."

Bush Finnell's Party

Up on the Powell street hill where the children of the stork disport themselves, laughing vigorously at one another's jokes, applauding unreservedly one another's antics and showing themselves in every way entitled to the distinction of being our village cut-ups, Bush Finnell, the lawyer, gave a party a few nights ago. When Finnell gives a party at the Family there is apt to be a good deal of noise, but on this occasion the general clatter was increased by the noise of a snare drum, a bass drum and two accordions manipulated by street musicians. Finnell's guests took their key from the music and cavorted in what is known as "roughhouse" fashion. It was too much for one of the street players. Tuning with a look of deep disgust to the bass drum the snare drum remarked: "In all my life I never see such a crowd of roughnecks."

The Waiter to the Rescue

A party consisting of Dudley Deane, the former California halfback, Horace Foster of the pay department of the army and two ladies, was supping a few nights ago in the Bismarck Cafe. Foster had been telling a few incidents of camp life during the army maneuvers at Atascadero. "What time did they sound reh-vay-yay?" asked one of the ladies. Foster leaned forward with an apologetic smile. "I'm sure you'll pardon me the liberty I take," he answered, "but that word, though originally French, has been Anglicized and is pronounced rev-cel-ay." The waiter, hovering near the table, had overheard the conversation and could not resist the opportunity. He came forward. "Beg pardon for intruding," he said, "but you are both mistaken. That word is Italian and it's pronounced ravioli."

The Death of Dorence Atwater

When Dorence Atwater died at the Hotel Normandie in this city and was laid to rest in Cypress Lawn Cemetery a couple of weeks ago, only one newspaper wrote his obituary and even that paper gave only a meager account of his remarkable career. There was nothing to indicate that the name of Dorence Atwater was once a household word throughout the length and breadth of this country. It remained for Kellogg Durland of the Boston Transcript to interview Atwater's only surviving brother in a small Connecticut town and chronicle the facts of his romantic career. For no American has ever had a more romantic and adventurous career, and certainly no American who has performed a notable and heroic service for his Government ever encountered the extraordinary reward which fell to Atwater. He was the only soldier at the time of the Civil War who served terms in prisons of the South and of the North. From the lowest depths of abject poverty he rose to a position of unique power and enormous wealth. His story is familiarly told, now almost as a tradition, by old sailors of the South Seas. And yet in San Francisco where of late years he spent a great deal of his time, Atwater was comparatively unknown and when he died there were few who knew that part of his history which is part of Civil War annals.

In the Civil War

Dorence Atwater was a farmer lad who was born and brought up in Terryville, Conn. Years ago a monument was erected in Terryville, Conn., to commemorate the services of Atwater during the Civil War; services that his Government fully appreciated, yet rewarded so strangely. In 1861 he was but sixteen years old, but being a well-developed lad, he easily passed for eighteen, and enlisted for service with the First Squadron Connecticut Cavalry. This squadron became a part of Kilpatrick's famous regiment, which participated in those actions of the early war which enshrined permanently the name of that commander in the annals of our war history. While carrying despatches, near Hagarstown, Md., in 1863, Atwater was captured by two rebel scouts who were dressed in Union uniforms. First he was sent to the Southern prison at Belle Isle in the James River, but was later transferred to the Andersonville stockade. At the time of Atwater's arrival there, Union soldiers were dying at the rate of 130 a day, as a result of the wretched conditions, exposure and starvation. The dead were buried promiscuously in common graves, and it was quite evident that the records which the Southern authorities were making of the dead were so incomplete and scanty that grave doubt was felt as to their ultimate value for purposes of identifying the graves of all the thousands of soldiers in blue whose lives ended in Andersonville. Atwater, himself, soon became a physical wreck, yet he had the courage, and found the strength, to make a careful record of all of the soldiers who died from the time of his arrival. When at last he was sent to the parole camp near Annapolis, he carried with him, secreted in the lining of his coat, a surprising record of 13,000 soldiers who died while he was their fellow-prisoner. At the close of the war, Atwater proceeded to Washington, and submitted this list to the Government, with the proposition that the Government supply him with the requisite number of head-boards, and that he be allowed to go back to Andersonville with the necessary force to erect these headboards over the graves of the dead Union soldiers, and that the list be further utilized to notify the families and friends of these men as to when and how they died. Being utterly broken in health, and penniless, and with no prospects of immediate work which would supply him with the necessary money to keep body and soul together, he asked for a reasonable compensation, and that the original rolls be returned to him, as he considered them his own private property. The Government awarded him $300, and sent him with Miss Clara Barton and a staff to Andersonville, where the work was completed.

His Unique Prison Record

Upon his return to Washington he requested that the rolls be given him, but the request was refused. He persisted, however, in his demand, submitting as his chief reason that he wished the families of the dead notified, a service which the Government had not rendered and gave no promise of rendering. As no heed was paid to this request, Atwater, seeing the rolls lying on the desk of an officer of the War Department one day, took them and carried them off. For this he was promptly courtmartialled, and sentenced to serve a term of eighteen months at hard labor in the prison at Auburn, New York! Atwater's defence was that a man had a right to take his own property. This defence proved invalid, however, and he was actually taken to the penitentiary and began to serve his long term at hard labor, depleted as he was in strength and vitality. A great outcry arose all over the United States. His cause was championed by Miss Clara Barton, by General Butler, by Horace Greeley and many other notable men and women of the time. After two months of servitude in prison, Secretary Stanton ordered his release. No pardon was granted him, no court authority sanctioned the act of the Secretary of War. The late Senator O. H. Platt said years later in the United States Senate that Atwater was the only man that had honestly gone out of a United States penitentiary without a discharge ordered by the court or a pardon from an executive. Atwater returned to Washington, and began a fight for rehabilitation. He felt that a great wrong had been done him, and that military justice for once had grossly miscarried. Thirty-five years later, in 1898, Congress put aside the findings of the Atwater courtmartial, granted him his long deferred honorable discharge from the army, and gave back to him his good name. This was the first instance on record of Congress setting

In the South Seas

Early in his fight for rehabilitation, President Johnson offered him the position of United States Consul to the Seychelles Islands, in the Indian Ocean. This was a personal matter with the President, who felt that Atwater was deserving of a living at the hands of the United States Government in return for the risks he had taken at Andersonville in secretly compiling his long list, for had he been discovered he would promptly have been shot. President Johnson did not feel clear as to how Atwater's case could be furthered at that time. Just before he set out for his post in the Indian Ocean, Horace Greeley arranged for the complete publication of Atwater's list, so that he left the United States with the satisfaction that his long and arduous work had been successfully consummated, despite the fact that he had been publicly branded and disgraced. Shortly after taking up his duties in the Seychelles Islands, the consulate there was suspended, but President Grant, who had then come into office, appointed Atwater as United States consul to the Society Islands. It was here that Robert Louis Stevenson met him, and wrote about him in "Ebb Tide." But at the time that Stevenson visited the South Seas, Atwater had passed through a remarkable period of adventurous achievement. The rulers of the Society Islands at that time were black, but this proved no bar to Atwater. He who had fought for four long years for the freedom of the black man was not unwilling to link his personal life with the colored race. To the consternation of many people in the United States he wooed and married Princess Moetia Salmon, who was the daughter of the reigning queen. Though still continuing as United States consul at a salary of $1000 a year, he became the virtual prime minister of the kingdom, and to a large extent controlled the policies of the Government, and was influential in shaping the destinies of the islands up to the time that they became a possession of France.

"The Pearl King"

The great pearl fisheries of the South Seas lay close to the door of Atwater, and as he had an opportunity to observe the pearl fishings in their successive seasons, he became inspired with the ambition to himself become a pearl fisher. His relations with the Government of the Society Islands made it possible for him to get hold of a sufficient sum of money to organize a pearling expedition. This enterprise proved so successful that he was enabled repeatedly to take part in the pearl fishings, and before long he became not only enormously rich, but is referred to to this day by the South Sea sailors as "The Pearl King." Still holding the post of United States consul, he organized the first line of ships between this city and Tahiti, a line of ships which he personally owned and continued to control to the day of his death. His friends in Washington never relaxed their efforts in his behalf, and it was through their activities that Congress was eventually prevailed upon to review the court-martial proceedings of thirty-five years before. Atwater had left San Francisco for his post as complete a physical wreck as a man could well be, embittered by his unusual experience at the hands of his Government, and penniless. When he returned to San Francisco he came in one of his own ships, accompanied by his princess wife, and with the reputation of being one of the wealthiest of men. It was not until he had served twenty-six years as United States consul that he resigned this connection with the United States Government, and after that he still continued to follow his adventurous life.

His Unfinished Adventure

At the time of his death Atwater was in the midst of an adventure peculiarly characteristic of himself. He knew that one silver dollar of United States currency could be exchanged for two Mexican silver dollars. One Mexican silver dollar bought three dollars of Tahiti scrip, and one Tahiti scrip dollar had the purchasing power in the South Seas of one United States dollar. Some months ago he loaded one of his ships with the strange cargo of a ton of American silver dollars and sailed to a Mexican port, where he exchanged his ton of American dollars for double the number of Mexican dollars and then returned to his island home to begin to exchange these Mexican dollars each for three Society Island dollars. The crude way in which he carried out this exploit is strikingly characteristic of the man during the latter part of his career. Instead of depositing the money in a proper repository, he piled the Mexican dollars into a number of wooden chests and then stored them in a woodshed connected with his own home, and proceeded to make his exchange gradually. In the midst of this operation his health, which had been so torn and racked by disease during his soldiering days, gave signs of completely breaking. So he returned once more to San Francisco for treatment. He had made considerable progress, he supposed, toward recovery, and had arranged to return to the South Seas two weeks ago, but he died on November 28. By a curious coincidence a bill was introduced into the last session of Congress to reward Dorence Atwater for the work he did at Andersonville, and this bill is scheduled to come up in Congress either this month or early in January. It calls for an appropriation of $25,000, in lieu of a pension, and is being sought as a final vindication of the man. This claim will be pressed by his estate, in the hope that although Atwater himself did not live how of his complete rehabilitation, his memory will be left without spot or stain in connection with the services he rendered during the days of the Civil War. Reference to the newspaper files of forty odd years ago will quickly show how widespread was Atwater's fame at that time, and in view of the fact that his fight has been maintained during all these years it is indeed a striking commentary upon our national character that today his name should awaken no memories.

Joaquin Miller in Real Estate

That Joaquin Miller would never have made a good real estate salesman was demonstrated a few nights ago, the demonstrator being Joaquin himself. The Poet of the Sierras was one of the speakers at the opening of the beautiful new Shattuck Hotel in Berkeley and delivered one of his characteristic effusions. Of course he had to say something about the Heights, the Promontory, the Mount on which he courts the Muses, and this is what he said: "These grounds are of no great value, for there is a stone or rock of some sort for every foot of earth and there is a gopher or squirrel for every stone, and each gopher and squirrel seems to have a large and prosperous family." It is veraciously chronicled that when the poet made this admission every real estate dealer present at the banquet gasped with amazement. They had never heard anybody make so derogatory a statement concerning a bit of land in Alameda County during the course of their business careers. By failing to boast, Joaquin committed the unpardonable sin, for boasting has become such a habit in California that he who refuses to indulge in it at all times and places is looked upon as a backslider.

Lee Christmas in Honduras

The papers have commented on the fact that the departure of the "Hornet" from New Orleans with ex-president Manuel Bonilla of Honduras and General Lee Christmas on board, has alarmed the State Department. Well it may, for while Bonilla is only the common or garden variety of Honduranian president, Lee Christmas is an experienced American revolutionist and soldier of fortune and war waits upon his beck and call. He has been in Honduranian revolutions before, has Lee Christmas, and he is still vigorous and avid of excitement. So anything may happen when he gets into action. Adventurer, bad man of the banana country, maker and unmaker of Honduranian presidents, Lee Christmas is one of the boldest of the revolutionists of modern times. It was while running an Illinois Central Railroad engine into New Orleans, that he conceived the idea of going into Honduras and making a living by creating state disturbances. Walker had gone to Cuba from New Orleans and his fate is history. Fred Wilson departed from Mobile for Costa Rica twelve years ago and was killed within a week after landing. Strassburg Fodde, a young German, concluded while planting beans in Mississippi that it would mean fun and a good living to stir up the natives of Guatemala. Few followed him from New Orleans and a few mornings after disembarking they were all macheted while rolling cigarettes. Christmas heard of these excursions while pulling hot ashes from fire boxes along the Mississippi river levees. The fate of the filibusters did not awe him; they rather encouraged him. So he went to Honduras.

His Ups and Downs

Physically Christmas is a giant—a handsome giant with broad shoulders, big blue eyes and a carriage that is military and commanding. He stands six feet two inches and it is said that he can fell an ox with one blow. In the early part of his Honduranian career he was a revolutionist on his own account. On his promise to abandon arms and be good he received $100,000 in depleted Honduranian currency. He was appointed Chief of Police of Tegucigalpa by President Soto, but left him to join a band of filibusters on the west coast. When the rebellion was over Christmas got his job again and served also under Generals Arias and Bonilla. When Sierra became president Christmas was made the generalissimo of the army as well as chief of police. The soldiery consisted of about 250 men, most of whom he rented out to the banana dealers at so much a day, dividing the profits with other members of the cabinet. When, through the work of his opponent Bonilla, General Arias was counted out in an election for the presidency, and General Sierra still held the job, Christmas departed again for the west coast where he organized an army and marched toward Tegucigalpa, the capital. The troops of the politician who had won the election—General Bonilla—were intrepid until they learned that Christmas with his American rifles and his rough and tumble fighters, mostly expatriates, were on their way to meet them; within an hour afterwards Bonilla had no army and Sierra kept his dignified position against both Arias and Bonilla. But Bonilla was resourceful. He sent an emissary to Christmas and offered him money to quit Sierra. As a result Bonilla became president. Christmas did not like Bonilla and very soon resigned his position to assume the management of the fifty-six mile railroad of Honduras. He had occupied this position for some time when he was reported dead. Then no more was heard of him until Bonilla and he sailed from New Orleans on the "Hornet." It will be worth while noting what follows their landing.

The Elusive Masculine

"I am determined that the men shall come to my ball if I have to call out the police patrol to bring them. I'm tired of seeing the girls acting as wall decorations for the lack of dancing partners." The words have a playful, but at the same time a determined quality. There is an accent of command, a tone of finality about them. They might conceivably have been uttered by a social czar, but it happens that they were not. They smack somewhat of the imperious locution of Mrs. Carolan, but Mrs. Carolan is saturation her soul in European culture of the very latest and most fashionable brand. She is too busy at the Pierian spring to talk about dances and wall flowers and such like frivolities. As a matter of fact, and to end the suspense, the words flowed from the pretty lips of a debutante. That makes them so much more remarkable, almost precocious, one might say. They were uttered by Miss Gertrude Thomas. At least so I am told, and see no reason to doubt the veracity of my informant. They are words which do Miss Thomas credit. More than that, they were words not idly spoken. For there were plenty of men at the Thomas ball.

A Record Established

Miss Thomas did not have to call out the police patrol. I am a little sorry that this was the case. Nothing would have delighted me more than to see the Black Maria dashing up to the Fairmont and discharging a load of recalcitrant bachelors. That would be a sight for gods and men. Interesting too would be the comments of the coppers who have an instinctive aversion for the man who wears pumps. Just why, I do not know. Perhaps it is their bad breeding—the policemen's, I mean. But to return. The men flocked to Miss Thomas' ball in record numbers. They overtopped the best previous count of the season. And they had a good time, almost in spite of themselves. Whenever they seemed inclined to shirk their duties, those charming matrons Mrs. Lathan McMullin and Mrs. Frederick Kimball urged them to renewed efforts. The result was that the girls all had partners, a remarkable state of affairs. All reports to the contrary notwithstanding, women like to dance at a dancing party, and as at the Thomas ball they "danced their heads off," as one bud expressed it with more picturesqueness than elegance, they voted the evening a huge success. The younger matrons like Mrs. Fred McNear, Mrs. Gus and Mrs. Will Taylor, Mrs. Worthington Ames and Mrs. James Follis disported themselves like debutantes.

A Family Feud

News comes from Washington that a feud is on between the Taft and Roosevelt families. The first hint of it that the public received came as a result of the exit of Mrs. and Miss Taft from Washington on the day the Colonel arrived to deliver his lecture before the National Geographical Society. At the coming-out tea of Helen Taft Alice Longworth was conspicuous by her absence, and in consequence tongues were set wagging freely. All Washington society is avidly watching for developments in what is regarded as a merry war.

He's a Man's Man

Some curious stories come out of Washington. The correspondents there are discreet. They don't tell all they know, but occasionally they whisper a spicy tale in one of the clubs and it is seized upon by some visiting journalist who carries it away and gives it wings. This briefly is the genesis of a story about Baron von Schlippenbach of the Russian Consular service who is on very intimate terms with the Russian Ambassador. The story is that a woman high up in the diplomatic service recently remarked that the Baron was distinctly a man's man. Asked why she thus characterized him she said that he once had in his employ for a number of years a woman who masqueraded as a man without ever penetrating her disguise. It was an extraordinary case. The woman went by the name of Nicolai de Raylan and was accepted everywhere as a man. She was married twice as a man, divorcing her first wife to take a second, and her sex was not disclosed until after her death, when an autopsy was performed, at which it was discovered that she was a woman. Baron Schlippenbach could not, would not believe it, and sent his own doctor to Arizona to view the remains before he would be convinced. It was incredible to him, and it was incredible to everyone who heard of the affair how this woman could have been with the Baron daily for thirteen years and he never once suspect her masquerade. Yet the Baron is a keen and intelligent man, and at the very head of the Russian Consular service.

The Ardent Groom

Miss Marian Newhall is to be congratulated. She is the envy of her less fortunate girl friends. Miss Newhall has reduced a groom to a condition of hopeless infatuation. Not a bridegroom course, but a groom of the stables. This is a romantic. The heroines of some of our romantic novels have been worshipped by grooms. The heroines of some of our plays have been won by grooms. But that is going far. Polite society frowns on such a demonstration. The groom may worship but must aspire. He may sigh in the stable but must approach the drawing room. The groom sus-ing hopeless passion catches the imagination. Not so the chauffeur. He is so likely not to keep his place; the object of his devotion so often sits beside his steering wheel. But the groom is used to trotting at a respectful distance. And I am glad to say that the groom who cannot resist the fascinations of Miss Newhall knows his place. He wrote letters to her which is excusable. He once rang her up on the telephone, which was not extreme, considering his state of mind. And like a good groom he desisted when told that things had gone quite far enough. It is all very romantic. No wonder Miss Newhall's friends are envious. But the romance has one alien element. The groom's first name is Herman. Herman is a good name—it is the same as Arminius which has a dignified sound. But his last name is Spritz and Spritz will never do.

Mr. Buck and the Diva

From those ladies who were invited by Mrs. Caloll Buck to drink a cup of tea with Madame Tetrazzini at the Palace last Friday have come enthusiastic expressions of pleasure in the affair. They agree that the table decorations, for instance, were in exquisite taste. The cake with the miniature Tetrazzini on it and the pink roses enlivened about it was acclaimed one of the sweetest little things of its kind ever prepared. The rare exotics strewn about the table—I refer to the flowers—came in for rapturous adjectives. The tea was brewed as tea ought to be brewed, which of course means that it was simply delicious. And Madame Tetrazzini? Well, the truth must just as well be admitted. Madame Tetrazzini was not there. Her manager was afraid she might sit in a draught and catch cold, so he insisted that she drink her tea on the balcony, which she did. But just the same it was a very successful affair.

Sl's Not of the Smart Set

Harrison Fisher has discovered his ideal beauty, and she is not of the smart set. Fortunately for Mr. Fisher he is not in society, else he would be ostracized. The newspaper sycophants of society have been telling us that there were so many "ideal beauties" in the swim that Mr. Fisher was having a difficult time making a selection. He was perplexed by the abundance of beauty. We were told of several young women whose pulchritude had dazzled him. All of them had "slashing heads," but it was hard to determine which was the slashingest. And now comes the news that what he was looking for was a girl of "a sensitive, high-bred type," with a strong face, a good jaw and plenty of character, all that he didn't find her either in Mrs. Buck's sitting club or Mr. Greenway's dancing club. The fact is that the high-bred type is somewhat rare, and hardly ever to be found in a mushroom aristocracy. The ideal beauty is Miss Maurine Hismussen, a talented girl of Irish and Danish extraction. She has not only a slashing head but also that inmost radiance that lies at the heart of things and that only the greatest portrait painter can reproduce.

The Crossing of Family Trees

In the press despatches of Wednesday was a piece of news from New York about the granting of a decree of divorce to Mrs. Guernsey Curran, which, it was said, marked the third unhappy ending of the interlaced romances of the James R. Curran and Clarence Postley families. Which reminds me that in a New York journal of December 22 was an item to the effect that it was gossiped in Paris that there was a prospect of a marriage between Mrs. Sterling Postley and Ross Curran, the ex-husband of her husband's sister. "Talk of Mr. Burbank's marvels in arboriculture!" said the writer; "nothing he has done could approach the culture of modern family trees."

Before the Bavardes Came

"Joe" Irwin, the veteran journalist, whose death occurred last Tuesday, was a man who could have written some interesting memoirs. He was the foremost chronicler of social doings in this city more than a quarter of a century ago, and he was well versed in the genesis of our provincial aristocracy. There is only one other man as intimately acquainted as he was with the history of local society; and that man is Mr. Edward Greenway to whom nearly all the leaders of present day society are indebted for their proud eminence. Irwin recorded the progress of many of them. In his latter days a smile of amiable cynicism often flitted across his face as he read of the splurging of some woman whose mother's modest ambition of other days was gratified when a brief notice of her "surprise party" appeared among the multitudinous paragraphs in Tuesday's Call. Irwin was social editor of the Call when that journal under the management of Loring Pickering enjoyed a wide circulation south of the slot. Every Tuesday the Call devoted two whole pages to social events in Tehama, Jessie, Minna and Stevenson streets. Those were the days when Mrs. Lloyd Tevis was the social arbiter of fashionable society. Most of the survivors of her set have drifted into the background. They have been crowded out by the sons and daughters and grandchildren of the people who gave the "parties" that were given publicity in Tuesday's Call. In those days there were no bavardes acting as press agents for the elect of society. The penchant for publicity was imported into high society by the descendants of the old-time polloi. They inherited it from their ancestors.

His Intimacy with the Fairs

"Joe" Irwin was social editor of the Call about the time that the men rich from the Comstock began to break into local society, and he celebrated their glittering functions. An intimacy sprung up between him and the Fairs, and when Mrs. Herman Oelrichs and Mrs. Willie Vanderbilt were young he superintended most of the social functions that were given at their home. In time he became so intimate with the family that rumors of an engagement between him and Mrs. Fair were frequently set afloat. It was believed that there might have been some foundation for these rumors had it not been for the fact that religious scruples deterred Mrs. Fair from marrying during the life-time of the husband from whom she had been divorced.

The Pacific-Union and the Ladies

I asked a clubman who belongs to both the Pacific-Union and the Bohemian whether there was to be a ladies' day to celebrate the opening of the new Pacific-Union clubhouse on Nob Hill. He smiled a thoughtful sort of a smile and then with considerable emphasis declared that there would be no ladies' day at the opening or at any other time. He explained that to satisfy the natural curiosity of the gentle sex two days would be set aside on which the clubhouse would be open for their inspection, but he was careful to point out that these two days would antedate the formal opening of the club. In other words the ladies are to be allowed to inspect the building—and a beautiful building they will find it—to their dear hearts' content, but it will be untenanted and there will be no provision for their entertainment. I did not have to ask the clubman why the Pacific Unionites had decided on this course. The reason is not far to seek. The ladies made such a hilarious function of their day at the Bohemian Club that it was difficult to induce many of them to depart when the clock struck the midnight chime. "Stick to your own clubs, dear ladies, and let us have ours to ourselves" is about the way the masculine clubmen who of course are a selfish crew, feel about the situation.

Which Is the Proper Word?

As the time for the aviation meet approaches the necessity for solving a vexatious etymological problem increases. Etymological problems usually arise and are solved in lecture rooms or under the midnight lamp, but this etymological problem has arisen and must be solved in society. That almost gives society the appearance of culture, but the problem is an eminently practical one, thereby sharing one of the conspicuous attributes of society itself. The problem may be stated simply. Is a woman who goes up in an aeroplane an "aviateuse" or an "aviatress" or an "aviatrix"? In the case of an ordinary woman the designation might be unimportant, but in society it is different. Society delights in labels. In fact without labels there would be no society. And the difficulty of fixing the proper term has thrown society into a turmoil. There are rival factions. The debate has been heated. The "aviateuses" regard the "aviatresses" with a good deal of disdain and both look down upon the "aviatrices" who in turn assume airs of considerable superiority toward the "aviateuses" and "aviatresses." Those who finished their education in France naturally insist on "aviateuse" while those who were schooled in this country defend the Anglo-Saxon or the Latin termination according as they did or did not read Caesar in high school. I would not dare to pass judgment ex cathedra, but I know which term is correct.

De Angelis in "The Beauty Spot"

Proud as we are of Jefferson De Angelis, native son, it would be too much to expect us to be fulsome in praise of Jefferson De Angelis, musical comedian. Within the limits of becoming compliment we joyfully hail his return and make him free of the strange new San Francisco, but putting these sentimental considerations aside, we cannot but feel a measure of disappointment in his work. It is too bad that he does not return to his old home in a more satisfactory role. In New York they are very fond of Jefferson De and again till it finally pierces to the seat of humor and draws a giggle or a guffaw. The method is old-fashioned. It takes too much time. In these days of rapid-fire fun an audience grows cold under such languishing treatment. To be cold is to be critical and to be critical, of course, is to find fault. But let not the culpability rest only on the shoulders of De Angelis. "The Beauty Spot" was not written in a jovial mood. Its author must have been the prey of melancholy when he fashioned his situations and studied them with jokes. There is precious little laughter imprisoned in "The Beauty Spot" and bursting to be set free. It is a slow-moving piece without enough flashes of merriment to blind the eyes to its foolish plot. The best of musical comedians would have to work overtime to make it go. In the matter of physical display it is a little beyond the usual. There were several audible gasps when the leading lady first appeared. Her gown was cut so low that I feared for her. A half inch lower and we had all been embarrassed. It is hard to explain such exposures. They overstep the line between good and bad taste and occasion vulgar comments. The stage is not the place for them.

—Edward F. O'Day.

Mary Mannering at the Savoy

The last performances of Jefferson De Angelis in "The Beauty Spot" will take place Saturday and Sunday evenings and on Monday night that distinguished actress, Mary Mannering, will begin an engagement limited to six nights in "A Man's World," a play written by Rachel Crothers who achieved considerable fame as the author of "The Three of Us." It is a drama of realism. The scene is laid in New York and Miss Mannering is said to appear to great advantage in her emotional role. The action is concerned with the double standard for men and women. On Sunday night, January 8, that important new American play, "The Nigger," will be presented at the Savoy by Miss Florence Roberts, Thurlow Bergen and a good company.

The Gerville-Reache Concerts

Mme. Gerville-Reache, the great contralto who is to appear at Christian Science Hall during the coming week, is perhaps the youngest of the great operatic stars on the stage. She is about twenty-seven years old and has already won renown in Paris, London and New York. As soon as she finishes her engagements in California she will hurry to New York to accept some special roles at the Metropolitan Opera House. At her first concert which is scheduled for next Thursday night, January 5, the artist will sing no less than six great operatic works, besides a dozen songs in German, French and English and at each of her subsequent concerts a great program will be given. Mr. Gyula Ormay will be the accompanist.

Alice Lloyd at the Orpheum

Alice Lloyd, the incomparable English comedienne who on the occasion of her engagement here a year ago created a tremendous furore, will return to the Orpheum next week and her reappearance is sure to be the signal for one of the greatest ovations ever tendered to an artiste, for she is idolized by the San Francisco play-going public. Miss Lloyd has recently arrived from Europe and the result of her trip will be evidenced by numerous beautiful and modish costumes and an entirely new repertoire of songs especially written for her and protected by international copyright. Harlan E. Knight and a capable little company will appear in "The Chalk Line," a comedietta by Una Clayton. The Four Famous Vanis, the most marvelous of tight-wire walkers, jumpers and cyclists, and Lew Sully, the celebrated minstrel, will be prominent contributors to the new bill. Next week will most positively be the last of the road show which includes among its most successful features the Rigoletto Brothers, La Pia, Melville and Higgins, and Howard, the clever Scottish ventriloquist.

"The Traveling Salesman" Coming

Following "The Dollar Princess" at the Columbia Theater will be seen James Forbes' comedy "The Traveling Salesman" which will be remembered as having met with exceptional success here last season. Henry B. Harris will send a strong company for the presentation of the piece and the limited engagement should be one of the most profitable of the season. "The Traveling Salesman" is replete with an unusual number of laughter provoking situations and Manager Harris has seen to it that his company is adequate. Crowded houses are the rule at the Columbia this week and the sale of seats for next week indicates that "The Dollar Princess's" popularity is on the increase. It has been a long time since such charming music as that of Leo Fall has been heard in this city. Beside the usual matinees on Wednesday and Saturday, there will be a special one on Monday, January 2.

ALICE LLOYD

The incomparable English singing comedienne who will appear this Sunday matinee at the Orpheum.

Angelis, but not, I take it, solely on account of his merits as a comedian. To the sophisticated audiences of Broadway he makes an intimate appeal because of his talent for mimicking other stars twinkling on the Great White Way. In revues and satirical pieces he is immense. But on this edge of the continent we want not satire but comedy and De Angelis is only mildly satisfying. By sheer perseverance he succeeds in making us laugh. If we don't get the point of his joke the first time, he makes it prick again

A HAPPY NEW YEAR

She will be happy the year 'round if you take her a box of Geo. Haas & Sons' delicious candies from time to time. Four convenient stores at which to buy them: Phelan Building, Fillmore at Ellis, Van Ness at Sutter and 28 Market St., near Ferry.

MME. GERVILLE-REACHE

The great contralto at Christian Science Hall.

Kocian, Master-Violinist

Jarislav Kocian, the Bohemian violin virtuoso who appeared here as a "wunderkind" some ten years ago, is again touring the country this time as a developed artist and recognized as one of the most important violinists living. Some five years ago he retired from the concert stage to devote himself to the most serious study of the art of ensemble playing and classical interpretations and for the past three years has been first violinist of the famous Moscow Quartette of Russia. A year ago he determined to tour as a virtuoso of the most developed type and his success on his reappearances in London and Berlin was tremendous. Greenbaum immediately secured him for a series of concerts in this city and Oakland. The opening date will be Sunday afternoon, January 15.

"Salomy Jane" at the Alcazar

"Salomy Jane," than which no prettier tale of the Sierras was ever staged, will be the Alcazar's next offering, commencing with a Monday matinee. It was in the title part of this play that Evelyn Vaughan made her first big hit as the Alcazar's leading woman and she will again be seen as the fascinating heroine of Bret Harte's idyl of the California foothills half-a-century ago, with Bertram Lytell as The Man (whose name is never disclosed) and the remainder of the company in well-fitting roles. Paul Armstrong dramatized the story of "Salomy Jane's Kiss," and with remarkable fidelity he presents the rough types of men, women and children whom Harte depicted. Not the least attractive feature of "Salomy Jane" is its atmosphere. All the scenes are laid in the Sierra woodlands and each of the four acts introduces a wonderfully realistic sylvan picture. When the play was last presented in the Alcazar the stage settings shared honors with the actors.

"The Blue Mouse" at Ye Liberty

For the week commencing with a special holiday matinee next Monday, the Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will offer the first production to be staged anywhere at popular prices of "The Blue Mouse," Clyde Fitch's celebrated comedy success. It is unquestionably one of the best farcical comedies the American stage has known for a good many years. The plot which revolves around the efforts of a middle-aged husband to carry on a flirtation with a famous Salome dancer, is unusually amusing and the bright lines and clever character drawing have made it a highly popular attraction. Manager Bishop has arranged to give "The Blue Mouse" not only a splendid cast but an attractive scenic setting as well. Miss Muriel Hope will have the title role and Sydney Ayres that of her fiancee, while George Friend, Henry Shumer, George Webster and the other Ye Liberty favorites will all have well-fitting roles. "Samson" is in preparation to follow.

Off-Stage

They had been talking theatrical gossip as they sat together in the deepening darkness. "I think I should change my name if I went on the stage," she said, softly.

For a moment there was silence. Then—"You can do that without entering the profession," he whispered, meaningly, and five minutes later she had told him to "ask papa."

Madame De Montbazon

Madame de Montbazon was a most beautiful being, who died of love—and that literally—in the other century, for the Chevalier de la Rue, who loved her not.

—Memoires de Saint-Simon.

The maid-in-waiting placed a vase of flowers upon the lacquer table, and arranged the wax-tapers, whose reflections watered with red and yellow the blue silk curtains hanging over the bed of the suffering lady. "Thinkest thou, Mariette, that he will come?"

"Oh, sleep, sleep a little, Madame!"

"Yes, I shall soon sleep, to dream of him throughout eternity!"

Some one was now heard ascending the stairs.

"Ah, if that were he!" murmured the dying lady, smiling, with the butterfly of the tombs already upon her lips.

It was a little page whom the Queen had sent to Madame la Duchess with sweet-meats, cuits, and elixirs on a silver tray.

"Ah, he does not come!" she said, in faint tones; "he will not come! Mariette, give me of those flowers, that I may breathe it and live it for the love of him!"

Then Madame de Montbazon, closing her eyes, remained motionless. She had died of love, giving up her soul in the perfume of a hyacinth.

Bacon—And did they call for the author of piece to come before the curtain?

Egbert—Oh, yes.

Bacon—And did he come out and make speech?

Egbert—No; he sent an apology.

Bacon—For his failing to appear?

Egbert—No; for the play!

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—There was so little doing in Wall Street the past week or so that trading was confined to the local professionals and prices changes were limited to fractional changes. Early in the week there was some disposition to advance the hard coalers on the excellent showing of the Lehigh Valley road and their announcement that the next dividend would be the regular dividend and a two per cent extra. The stock was the center of attraction and added a little strength to Reading, which company owns a large amount of Lehigh stock, and it was freely predicted that with an increase in the Lehigh dividend the Reading directors would increase the dividend of that stock but when the regular dividend on Reading was announced without anything extra the market lost its buoyancy and prices sold off rather sharply which cooled the balance of the list with them. Trade conditions throughout the country are anything but optimistic, especially so in the Steel business. The big trust is running only about half time and another large plant was closed down this week with talk of a further cut in finished steel products. Outside trade in stocks is at a standstill and prices are allowed to drift. However, business in bonds has shown some improvement and as this is generally a forerunner of better times it looks as if stocks could be purchased at this level without much risk to the buyer.

Wheat—Trade has been extremely light in the wheat pit the past week with prices practically at a standstill. Statistical news has been generally bearish both here and in Europe. Stocks of wheat keep piling up and each weekly statement shows a further addition to an already large visible supply. Cash demand is very limited and millers generally report a poor demand for flour with some of the northwestern mills closing down. Export business is out of the question as our market is from 5 to 6 cents out of line with Europe seems to have no trouble in getting the wheat supplied from other exporting countries. Argentina has had excellent weather for gathering their crop and the quality is said to be excellent, which means that the crop estimates will have to be advanced. Compilation of the wheat crop figures from Russia by the Frankfurter Zeitung is in line with the latest figures that have reached the trade here. They show there is now no doubt Russia has raised another phenomenal crop, but that it falls short of the preceding year. The crop of 1909 broke all records. Shipments from there were the largest on record. They continued in full volume until the present wheat crop was harvested, and all Russia has during the period from July 1st to Saturday last cleared 125,000,000 bushels compared with 123,000,000 bushels in the corresponding period last year. There has been some talk of drought in our southwest as the rainfall in Texas and Oklahoma is far below the usual precipitation at this season of the year but on the whole the crop is said to be in fair condition to withstand the winter months.

Corn—Not much change in corn prices from the previous week. There was a little flurry in the December option which was brought about by the shorts who were afraid of a possible squeeze in this option as the time for making of contract corn by the elevators is getting very short and stocks of contract corn in Chicago at a very low ebb. Receipts are increasing and the demand for the cash article has been slow all week. The eastern demand for corn is also said to be slow and our prices are too high to meet the exporters' bids. Argentine will raise a large crop this year as the weather conditions have been very favorable, and unless our market declines to a price that will admit of export business stocks of corn will pile up rapidly. We see nothing in the market on the long side and advise sales on all rallies.

Cotton—The principal factor in the cotton trade the past week has been the ginning report issued by the United States Census Bureau which showed the amount ginned up to December 13th to be 10,698,000 bales. Up to this time sentiment had been extremely bullish and a report of around 10,600,000 or less had been expected. A little setback in prices was experienced in the first few minutes of trading following this report but as the bulls who have had the market in hand for the past season were not inclined to let go and the bears did not press their advantage the market was allowed to drift into a rut in which it has remained the balance of the week. Re-Europe, however, are not as glowing; as a matter of fact they are not satisfactory, for while exports to Great Britain so far total 1,915,000 bales against 1,268,000 bales last year, shipments to continental Europe are less than one year ago, 1,913,000 versus 2,083,000 bales. Insofar as the textile trade in America is concerned, the outlook is not promising. Retail business is fairly good, but there has been little doing in exports for some time, especially to China, to which country shipments of cotton goods from the port of New York since January 1st have been 59,000 packages against 170,000 packages one year ago, and business was poor then. Sales of print cloths at Fall River last week were only 80,000 pieces, about one-third of the output, and it is said if there is not a sharp demand for the output soon after the turn of the year, curtailment will be resorted to in New England and the south. Nevertheless the cotton market is being sustained on favorable trade advices from England alone where consumption amounts to about 30 per cent of the world's total, while about 70 per cent of the world's consuming districts report unsatisfactory conditions. The market is in a waiting attitude and will probably remain so for some time as outside speculation is at a low ebb.

that by the spring war will be declared for certain.

"It is not certain, my friend," I said, interrupting him.

"No, no, you know, better than I do even, that it will come for certain, and it is useless to say 'no' to me, for I am prepared for it already." But the poor girl! Listen to what she did to me the other evening. She took my hand, and without speaking a word led me to the mill wall. And when we were there she looked at me and sighed. "Well," said I. "You see that water?" said she, "If they take you away and send you to the war, when you come back look for me down there." And then she was silent and said nothing more all the evening.

Our colloquy was interrupted by Fiorella's voice calling from the opposite hill:

"Pipettaaa!"

"What is it?"

"Run home at once, there is somebody who wants you."

Pipetta hastened away, and I went towards the girl.

I found her crying; but this time her tears were different from that passing shower I had seen her give way to, when a little girl, in the wood by the tower. I tried to calm her, but for some minutes it was impossible. I said a few words of comfort, but what could I comfort her with? I scolded her gently: she paid no heed to me. I sat down by her and waited. Little by little she seemed to calm herself, and I placed my hand softly on her head; but my caress only made her redouble her sobs more desperately than ever.

"But what is the matter? For the love of heaven, what is the matter?" You surely know me by now; you know all the friendship I feel for you two, all the affection I have always had for you—"

She threw herself on her face on the ground, crying:

"O God, O God! help us, for mercy's sake—for mercy's sake help us, I implore Thee!"

"But what has happened? Do tell me."

"They are stealing him from me, they are stealing him from me, they are taking him away from me!" And she said nothing else, but remained there half fainting, trembling and lamenting:

"They are taking him away from me, they are taking him away from me!"

I did not know what to do, alone as I was with no companion but the dog, which leaped round us in alarm, barking and licking now my face and then the girl's. At last I recognized Fiorancino, the woodman's voice, calling from a distance:

"Oh, you up there; what has happened?"

"Fiorancino, I beg you," I replied, "Fiorella has been taken ill. Come up here at once, or run to her home and send someone directly, but fly!"

Five minutes later poor Fiorancino, all anxious, had joined us. The moment he saw the girl in that state, he grumbled, throwing a suspicious glance at me:

"Good heavens! what has happened?"

"Silence—be quiet," I answered firmly. "Now is the time to act and not talk. Let us carry her to the house, and you will know about it down there. Come, support her here, underneath, and let us go."

Fiorancino had a great desire to talk, and I none at all. I answered him nothing, but was all the time giving my attention to the placing of my feet securely on the way down the steep mountain paths.

When we arrived at the mill, Pipetta was not there, because he had gone, they told me, to the prior with a paper in his hand which a short time previously had been brought by a sergeant of the commune, who had said something about the conscription.

Fiorella came to herself a little later and appeared fairly calm; but I made them put her to bed, because it seemed to me that she was rather feverish. I told her people that I would think about sending a doctor, and then went to my own house.

I returned the next day, and, to my great surprise, found Fiorella seated at the door of the house. She said good-morning to me, smiling sadly. She told me that Pipetta had been enrolled, and that in four days he would go to Samminiato for the medical inspection, and thence directly to the Fortezza da Basso at Florence, for such a fine youth as he, she said, would be accepted at once.

Such great calmness surprised me somewhat; but I did not think much of it then. I told her how pleased I was to find her so reasonable, and tried, though with repugnance, to make her believe that her Pipetta would come back soon, because war was not even talked about. I told her that, after all, the trouble did not do much harm, because they were both rather too young; that some months of separation would only increase their love; and as many other things as I thought likely to confirm the resignation that seemed to have pervaded her soul.

She paid great attention to me, seemed grateful for what I said to her, and begged me to accept some cream cheese made by her that morning; for Pipetta had done nothing but run from the priest to the mayor, from the mayor to the doctor, all morning.

Late in the evening, before leaving her, I told her that for some days I should not be able to appear, because urgent business called me to Leghorn, where I must stay at least a week. She wished me a pleasant journey and said nothing else. But that evening I went away oppressed, by sad presentiments: may God shield us from all harm!

I thought I should not have to stay more than ten days or so at Leghorn; but on account of the tiresome slowness of the procurators and lawyers I had to be there a month and some days, so bothered with the troubles of a lawsuit that I even forgot my unhappy friends during the whole time.

Having returned home at last, none of my family could give me news of them, because I had never spoken to anyone of that adventure. So that, late in the evening, a few hours after my return, I was already in the saddle and galloping towards the mountains.

When I passed the doctor's house, he was at the window and called me.

"Oh, doctor! good-day."

"Good-day. Are you going up there?"

"I am going up there."

"Don't go."

"Why?"

"Take my advice, don't go."

"But what has happened? Has something dreadful happened? Do not keep me in such suspense."

"Have the patience to dismount and come in for a moment. Giuseppe!" to his servant, "take the horse to the stable and give him a handful of hay."

"I beseech you, doctor, tell me quickly what you want to, because truly I cannot stop."

"Come in."

"No."

"Will you come into the sitting-room?"

"No, no!"

"Just see how hot you are! Will you have something to drink first?"

I had to go into the sitting-room, sit down, drink something, and finally, after paying thus dearly for it, I succeeded in finding out what had happened during my absence.

The young man had been examined, was found to be without a flaw, and the next day was in the Fortezza, dressed as a recruit. When the girl heard this, she said nothing, did not lament, did lotry; only everyone had cause to be seriously lamed for her reason, for the same day there was no way of getting her to leave the entrance of the house, where she stayed until the evening, trampling down and making circles in the dust with a straw, without asking for anything to eat or drink, and breaking out into a fury every time another begged her to come away out of the blazing sun.

"But you, doctor," said I interrupting, "did you do anything? Did you try nothing?"

"Everything was tried, but all in vain. The commander was written to, and the answer was no. They wrote again to beg him to send the boy for at least a day, and the answer was again no.
I made them write to the prior, Signor Leopoldo telegraphed to the prefettura—in short, by dint of appealing right and left, he appeared here a fortnight ago today, more dead than alive, coming from Florence, and I accompanied him to the house to see the effects of the meeting.

"So sooner had the girl seen him from the distance than she began to gaze fixedly at him; then she rose suddenly with a spring and ran into the house to give notice, it seemed, of our arrival.
But she came out again directly with a scythe in her hand, and running to meet us approached Pipetta yelling like one in despair:

"Kill him! kill him!" so that if Fiorancino had been there by chance to help me hold her, she would have struck him on the head and killed him for certain, for he remained standing there like a rock and would not have even tried to avoid the blow."

"She is mad, then?"

"Only too much so! And, unhappily, no longer furious, for after that outburst her derangement had taken a form—"

"Let me go, doctor."

"No, no! Now hear about him—?"

"Never mind, never mind—you will tell me later."

"And with the doctor running after to stop me, I went to the stable, sprang into the saddle and was like the wind.

"Half way there I met Fiorancino who made his way to me from afar to stop. I slackened my grip a little, and when he was near me:

"Oh, dear!" said he, "I would never have believed it of him."

"What has happened?"

"Don't you know that when they let the mill water run dry—"

"Drowned?"

"No, signore. For it seems that instead of going back to Florence, as he went away late in the evening—"

"Did not wait for him to finish, but raced off, duly spurring my poor beast.

"A few steps from the mill my horse shied as if he had been startled, and backed, snorting.
Pipetta's mother came out of the house, crying:
'They are running over her! They are running over her!' Then, when she had recognized me,
'Oh, it is you? Welcome back, signore.' She burst out weeping bitterly and pointed to her daughter who was crouching on the edge of the road, shaking her head, while she sang low a melancholy air in a voice that seemed to come from far, far away.

"I dismounted and ran up to her, calling her by her name; but she did not even move. I sat down beside her, took her head between my hands and tried to speak thus:

"Fiorella! poor Fiorella! it is I. Don't you recognize me? Tell me what you feel: have you a pain here?" touching her head. "And don't you remember poor Pipetta? Look, you wanted them so much! I have brought you the coral earrings."

She did not move. Putting my hand under her chin, I gently raised her face. She fixed her wild eyes upon mine and became silent; she seemed to be trying to move her lips, and I waited for an answer. But instead she slowly, slowly pushed me from her and let her head fall again abandoned on her chest. I turned to her mother, who was sobbing apart:

"Maria, poor woman!" said I, taking her hand.
"Ah! dear signore—see what we have come to!"

The mill-wheel ceased working, and in the quiet of the sunset the woodcocks could be heard calling each other to roost from the tops of the hills.

TWAIN

A New Edition

Now for the first time you get a complete set of all Mark Twain's writings at just exactly one-half the price they have ever been sold before. This is a new edition, just as complete as the old one, which still sells, by the way, at $50.00. This new edition is only $25.00—for the 25 volumes.

It had been Mark Twain's ambition to have his books in every American home, and he made a great personal sacrifice to bring about this remarkable opportunity—for the first time in the history of publishing, copyrighted books are sold at the price of non-copyrighted books—the chance will not come again.

But for Mark Twain's action this would have been impossible. Never before has a copyrighted library set of a standard author's works been issued at such a low figure.

His Complete Works— 25 Beautiful Volumes

Brander Matthews says: "Mark Twain will be included in that group of writers headed by Molière and Cervantes. With the exception of Count Tolstoi, Twain was the greatest of recent modern writers, and will be handed down to posterity through the trio of his works 'Huckleberry Finn,' 'Tom Sawyer,' and 'Pudd'nhead Wilson.' Twain is a greater stylist than Stevenson or Thoreau, and his 'Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg' is one of the finest works in English literature." Mark Twain himself wrote a preface to this edition. Brander Matthews has written the biographical criticism of Mark Twain and his work. There are portraits of the author at periods when the different books were in process of writing.

There are beautiful pictures by such artists as Frost, Newell, Smedley, Thulstrup, Clinedinst, Kemble, and Oppen. The binding is in rich red rep silk book cloth, with title labels stamped in gold. The books are printed on white antique wove paper, especially made for this edition. Each volume is of generous size and bulk, 5x7 1/4 inches.

Delicious Dishes Easy to Make—Tested Recipes from Culinary Authorities

It is not always easy to have a bountiful supply of milk or cream on hand, yet one or both of these are necessary ingredients of almost all nice cooking, especially for dishes suited for high days and holidays when the pride of a hostess demands that her table shall be graced with dainty appearing and deliciously flavored dishes.

The following recipes made with high grade evaporated or condensed milk are worth trying and preserving, for with a few cans of these on her shelves the housekeeper is quite independent though milk be scarce and cream be prohibitive in price or difficult to obtain.

Christmas Pudding.—Dilute two-thirds can of Eagle Brand Condensed Milk with one and one-fourth cups of water. Beat eight eggs very light, add to them half the milk, and beat both together, then stir in gradually one pound of crumbled crackers, one pound of suet (chopped fine), one grated nutmeg, one tablespoonful cinnamon, one teaspoonful cloves, a pinch of salt, and two pounds of raisins (weighed after washing, stoning and chopping), lastly add the remainder of the milk. Pour into a pudding mould and steam six hours. Serve with hard and cream sauce flavored to taste.

New England Pumpkin Pie.—Cook the pumpkins slowly four hours. Put in, when nearly mashed, one-half cup molasses to each three quarts of pumpkin; stir constantly to prevent burning. When done strain through a sieve. For each large pie use two and one-half cupfuls of the mixture, add it to six tablespoonful Eagle Brand Condensed Milk, diluted with one and two-thirds cups of hot water, three tablespoonful sugar, a little ground allspice, two teaspoonful cinnamon, one teaspoonful salt and a small piece of butter. Set to cool, and then add two well beaten eggs. Bake in a moderate oven, lining the deep pie plate with a good plain paste. Bake until a thin brown crust forms on the pumpkin, usually about forty-five minutes. A good grade of canned pumpkin will be satisfactory if similarly mixed and baked.

Dutch Coffee Cake.—Set a sponge with one-half cup Eagle Brand Condensed Milk diluted with two and one-half cups of water, one cup baker's yeast (one cake Vienna yeast will work up three pounds of flour), one-half pound of butter, one-quarter pound lard, three-fourths pound sugar, a flavoring of cinnamon and nutmeg, one pound raisins, and three pounds of flour. Put the milk and yeast with part of the flour to raise in the early morning. When light, mix in the other ingredients and set to raise again, working in the remainder of the flour and shaping into round loaves. When again light, bake in a rather quick oven so that the crust will be quite brown. Many people sprinkle a little sugar on the loaves to make a slight glaze. Delicious with coffee at breakfast, or at any time.

Dutch Apple Cake.—Mix together two cupfuls sifted flour, half a teaspoonful salt, one generous teaspoonful butter. Beat one egg, add it to four tablespoonful Eagle Brand Condensed Milk diluted with three-fourths cup of water and stir into the dry ingredients. Beat well and spread the dough half an inch thick in shallow oblong baking pans. Pare six apples, cut into eights and arrange them sharp edge down, in parallel rows on top of the dough, pressing them in slightly. Sprinkle one-third of a cup of sugar and a little cinnamon over the apples, and make in a hot oven about half an hour. If apples are not tart squeeze a little lemon juice over them before placing on crust.

Dutch New Year's Cake.—These are really nice cookies with caraway seeds which can be omitted if not liked. Beat one egg until light, add a generous half cup of sugar, one tablespoonful mixed spices, two-thirds cup of molasses and same of butter melted and beat thoroughly. Add four tablespoonful Eagle Brand Condensed Milk diluted with three-fourths cup of water in which one teaspoonful of soda has been dissolved, then stir in two and one-half cups of flour sifted and mixed with one level teaspoonful cream of tartar. Add one tablespoonful lemon juice. Omit the molasses, and double the quantity of sugar, and add four ounces of caraway seeds for Dutch Cookies. Cut in shapes and bake in moderate oven.

Velvet Cream.—Cover half a box of gelatine with cold water, let it soak twenty minutes. Dilute one can Pioneer Brand Evaporated Milk with an equal quantity of water and put in double boiler. When hot add three-quarters cup sugar and the gelatine. Stir, strain, and when cold, not stiff, flavor with one teaspoonful vanilla extract and add half cup of sherry. Turn into a large or small mould and set on the ice to harden.

Vanilla Ice Cream.—Dilute one can Borden's Eagle Brand Condensed Milk with twice the quantity of water previously boiled. Add one teaspoonful of vanilla, strain and freeze. This makes two quarts of ice cream, or to each can of Borden's Pioneer Evaporated Milk, add equal amount of water that has been previously boiled and cooled, and one-quarter pound refined sugar. Flavor to suit taste, and freeze.

Bisque Ice Cream.—Dilute three cans of Borden's Pioneer Brand Evaporated Milk with equal quantity of water, scalded and cooled; in cup sugar and stir occasionally until dissolved. Melt one-third cupful of sugar in a flat bottom pan to a caramel, stirring constantly; then add one-quarter cupful hot water. Pour this into the milk and add one and one-half cups hickory nut meats chopped fine. Pack in the freezer usually, not turning very fast at first, but more rapidly after ten minutes.

Orange Ice Cream.—To the strained juice of six oranges and the grated rind of one, add three-quarters of a pound of granulated sugar, stir until dissolved. Dilute two cans Borden's Pioneer Brand Evaporated Milk, with an equal quantity of water previously boiled and cooled. Add to the orange juice and freeze as usual.

Macaroon Ice Cream.—Beat the yolks of three eggs, using a spoon instead of an egg beater, add one full half-cup of sugar, and saltspoor of salt. Dilute three-fourths of a cup of Eagle Brand Condensed Milk with twice the quantity of water. Put on the stove and when scalding pour on egg mixture. Cook in double boiler stirring constantly. When done, it will have creamy appearance. Strain, add one and one-half cans Pioneer Evaporated Milk diluted with an equal quantity of water, and four tablespoonfuls of Madeira, or two teaspoonfuls vanilla extract. When partly frozen, take out dasher, and stir in one-half pound of macaroons dried and pounded fine.

KEEPING IN TOUCH WITH HOME

IT IS wonderful how much satisfaction can be obtained from a talk over the Bell Telephone.

A letter carries words, but the Bell Service has been brought up to such a point of perfection that the modulations of the voice are clearly heard.

The cheery tones show that the talker is well and in good spirits. The call may come from a suburban village or a distant city, but within the limits of the carrying power of the voice of the Bell Service carries the tone as well. You get a personal interview with a friend hundreds of miles away.

Auto Notes

The motor car is fast becoming a prominent factor in advance newspaper distributing methods. Among the California dailies which are making extensive use of the automobile in this department is The Fresno Republican which recently purchased a Chalmers "30" car. This machine in its first month of service covered in excess of 3,000 miles. Beside general work in connection with the Republican office it makes a daily rural circuit of 80 miles over some of the hardest going in the Fresno vicinity for the purpose of distributing papers. The loads run as high as 1400 pounds.

One of the most remarkable of recent instances of tire service is that given by a Diamond which equips the White Steam Touring Car belonging to J. R. Leppo, the prominent Santa Rosa attorney. Speaking of this Diamond Mr. Leppo says: "It is a 34x4 tire, and has been in constant use on my White Steamer Touring Car since June, 1907. The car during that time has gone over all kinds of roads, in all kinds of weather, and under heavy loads, and the tread is still good and apparently has much wear left in it. It has run over 12,000 miles—probably considerably more." Among the local agencies which are already making extensive preparations for the Panam-Pacific road race is the Consolidated Motor Car Co. It will be remembered that a Pope Hartford car entered by this concern won the Portland race last year in a most sensational manner. For this year's race the Pope factory is shipping out one of the Vanderbilt entries which but for trouble would have had an excellent chance of capturing that classic event.

A number of local motorists went to Los Angeles to attend the automobile show there. Among those who have gone is W. B. Cochran of the Haynes Auto Sales Company. According to advices received from the southern metropolis the Haynes has an attractive display at the show. Motor Age in its annual review of 1910 road racing has gathered together much interesting data relating to the big road events of the past year. Motor Age gives to Mulford in the Lozier the driving honors of the year, and to the Lozier not only the official title of Stock Car Champion, but recognizes the Lozier as the free-for-all road champion of the past season.

After an 8,000 mile trip through the far west, Sales Manager E. C. Morse of the Hudson Motor Car Company has reported to the officers of that concern that westerners have taken up the automobile as the most useful and beneficial factor in their daily lives. Mr. Morse gives it as his opinion that the motor car's future in the West, judging from the increase in sales of Hudson cars over last year, is one of the most promising conditions in the automobile industry.

A shipment of 1911 Pope-Hartford cars was unloaded recently by the Consolidated Motor Car Co. The shipment included one of the new 1911 limousines. This car is among the most elegant machines that ever came to the city. It has a full electric light equipment, speaking tube, clock, the richest upholstery and a body finish that is the height of excellence. It is attracting much interest in local motoring circles.

H. D. Radeff has just completed a remarkable trip in a Ford touring car equipped with Diamond tires, traveling 6,500 miles on the same set of tires, which completed the journey in first class condition. So confident was Mr. Radeff in the merits of the Diamond product that he did not carry even one extra tire.

THE GALLANT

My curled mustaches resemble the tail of the tarask, my linen is as white as the table-cloth of an inn, and my doublet is not older than the tapestries of the crown.

Would one imagine, seeing my smart bearing, that hunger, lodged in my belly, is pulling—the torturer!—a rope that strangles me as though I were being hanged?

Ah, if from that window, where dances a shriveling light, a roasted lark had only fallen in the cock of my hat, instead of that faded flower!

The Place Royale, tonight under the links, is as clear as the chapel; look out for the letter! Fresh lemonade! Macaroons of Naples! Here, little one, let me dip a finger in your truite a la sauce! Rascal!—there lacks spice to your April-fool!

Do I not see yonder Marion Delorme on the arm of the Duc de Longueville? Three lapdogs follow her yapping. She has fine diamonds in her ears, the young courtesan! He has fine rubies on his nose, the old courtier!

And the gallant struts about, fist on hip, elbowing the men and smiling on the women. He did not have enough to dine on; he bought himself a bouquet of violets.

"This play seems to have an unusually skimpy plot to it."

"This isn't a play. This is a vaudeville show."

The Site Question

It is somewhat premature to take up for consideration the question of the most suitable site on this peninsula for a world's fair. But we find that the question is already under discussion in certain newspapers that have curious sources of inspiration. Their purpose apparently is to suggestionize the public mind, to prepare it, as it were, for a decision that already has been reached. Not while we have no site to recommend, no real estate to boom, there is a suggestion that we would offer with all due deference touching not the site question but the principle of solving it. The suggestion is that we give the dear people a chance to be heard. The fair is not to be a private enterprise. All the people are to be interested, and on so important a question as the selection of a site they may feel that they should be consulted. The principle of consulting the people on all important matters we do not approve, but it is one that our daily contemporaries have most warmly espoused, and we would have them logical and consistent. The referendum is their darling catechism. Their faith in the referendum is born of their confidence in the divine wisdom of the masses. Their maxim is that the people never go wrong, that they can always be depended upon to do the right thing at the psychological moment howsoever complicated, abstruse or perplexing the problem they are called upon to solve. So they are to hold the Fair why not let the amiable mob select the site? The result of course will be much competition, a victory by a minority and general dissatisfaction, but the test to which the principle of the referendum will be subjected will be innumerable and instructive.

Prize That's Hard to Bear

"the villain's censure is extorted praise" what shall we say of the villain's commendation? We ask the question for the benefit of Justice Angellotti who, having found himself praised in the Boughten Bulletin, must necessarily be perturbed and at the same time in a receptive mood for consoling assurance. It requires a good deal of courage to be able to bear the approval of that unscrupulous journal. When the Boughten Bulletin was slandering the justices of the Supreme Court and insinuating that it would be a good thing for a mob to hang the judges of the Court of Appeal those gentlemen had no reason to be disquieted, but now that encomiums are issuing from the same source and pouring on the head of Justice Angellotti there is somebody to be compassionate. For there are persons whose praise ought to give us a mean opinion of ourselves; and the editor of the Boughten Bulletin is one of them. We are sorry for Justice Angellotti. We commiserate him because we cannot soothe his troubled soul with the assurance that the boughten journal's praise is satire in disguise. What a person praises is a sure standard of his character, and in this instance what Justice Angellotti is praised for is precisely what one might have conjectured would meet with the warm approval of a man of the character of the editor of the Bulletin. He is praised for giving his sanction to a practice so infamous that it has come to excite universal abhorrence. The courts of several States have recently put the seal of their disapproval on the "third degree," an expedient that has been handed down to us from the days of the inquisitorial trial, and the Supreme Court of this State in an opinion written by Justice Melvin has happily raised a barrier against the misguided zeal of police and prosecuting officers and for the safeguarding of individual liberty. From this opinion Justice Angellotti has dissented, and for this he has been praised by the Boughten Bulletin.

Hiram and "Battle Bob"

Back from the effete East came the Hon. Hiram Johnson last week bloated with a pardonable pride born of the consciousness of the vastly superior quality of the intelligence that abides in his native State. Addressing the members of the Legislature at a conference in this city he said: "I learned that the East is more populous than the West, that New York is wealthier than California and that we are one thousand miles ahead of them in political economy. We can teach them how to govern themselves." This is hardly to be considered an outburst of startling intelligence and wisdom. It is incredible that Mr. Johnson was ignorant of the population and wealth of New York before taking his trip East; and despite his prodigious modesty, when we elected him to office he must have persuaded himself into the conviction that we far surpassed the people of New York in our knowledge of the science of government. Nay it is more than likely that at the time of his election he became convinced that nowhere on earth was there so much intelligence, wisdom and common sense as within the borders of this State. And as to the people of New York their hopelessly benighted state is argued by the circumstance that they regard the so-called progressive movement as nothing more than a rattle-trap vehicle for the ambitions of a little coterie of pestiferous demagogues. In New York "Battle Bob" La Follette, the leader of the movement, a man who commands at once the reverence of Mr. Johnson and the esteem of Mr. Fremont Older, is regarded as a half-baked statesman with the arts of a mountebank and the zeal of a fanatic. Which goes to show how utterly obtuse are the people of the great State to which it is popularly believed the shrewdest and most nimble-witted of Americans gravitate from all sections of the Union. The truth is of course that the most enlightened people in this country are to be found in such States as California, Wisconsin, Kansas and Oklahoma. In these ultra-civilized States the people have brought to bear on political phenomena the patient analysis and unbiased research which are the proper marks and virtues of scientific inquiry, and as a result of their labors we have the progressive movement, the purpose of which is to introduce some brand new principles of government and enable such distinguished and learned patriots as "Battle Bob" and our own Hiram to rescue the pillars of State from the special, sordid and shameless interests. One thousand miles ahead of New York in political economy! New York is as far behind us in all that concerns the welfare of mankind as the ark is behind the swiftest and most luxurious Atlantic liner.

Judas Iscariot

The play in which Sara Bernhardt is making her current farewell tour of this country is said to be devoted to the whitewashing of Judas Iscariot. The playwright makes it appear that the Apostle was moved rather by jealousy than by greed. The theme of his play is the mad infatuation of Judas for the beautiful Mary Magdalen. An interesting theory this, but without anything in the nature of historic evidence or suggestion to justify it, and yet it has been seriously entertained by poets who have made it the theme of passionate verses of a blasphemous nature. A much more subtle theory and one equally valuable for dramatic purposes was conceived in Germany centuries ago. By this theory also is the betrayal of Christ palliated, for it challenges the imputation to Judas of any motive or any ruling impulse tainted with vulgar treachery. Upon this theory De Quincy expatiates in one of the most powerful and persuasive of his analytical essays. It is postulated of Judas by his apologists that he shared the common delusion of the apostles regarding the earthly kingdom which they supposed to be waiting for the Jewish people, and that he went further than any of them in speculating as to the reason why Christ delayed the realization of his mission. Believing that Christ contemplated liberating the Jewish people from the Roman yoke, and that like Hamlet he suffered from indecision and doubt, he felt that the Master should be precipitated into action by a force from without. The true grandeur of the Christian scheme had not dawned on him. Sharing in the blindness of all Christ's followers he greatly exceeded them in presumption. This, as De Quincy shrewdly points out, was quite natural inasmuch as Judas being the purse-bearer, the purchasing agent of the apostolic fraternity, came in contact with the petty shop-keepers who receive and give back all Jacobinical impulses. At that time, as history tells us, revolutionary feelings were fermenting all over Judea. The Jewish people were impatient of the Roman yoke. There was much unrest, explosive materials were accumulating. There was nothing wanted but a leader and such a leader was the founder of Christianity, who everywhere drew crowds about him, making a deep impression by his teachings. And such was the veneration in which he was held by the populace that his enemies dared not seize him by day. If arrested at all it would be advisable to arrest him by night, but at night he withdrew into solitudes known only to his disciples. All of which is evident from the fact that his betrayal was called for. Now as we learn from the New Testament prior to the crucifixion the apostles had but a vague idea of the object of Christ's teachings. The prevalent notion was that he came on earth rather to restore David's throne than to establish a religion. What more natural then than that Judas should have supposed that if Christ were arrested he would no longer vacillate but would be forced to give the signal to the populace of Jerusalem who would rise for the purpose of putting him at the head of an insurrectionary movement? Taking this view of the matter Judas might have supposed himself, says De Quincy, "to be executing the very innermost purposes of Christ which it was the characteristic infirmity of Christ to want." In other words it is argued that he did not seek to thwart the purposes of Christ but to promote them. And De Quincy finds verification of this theory in the circumstance that when Judas found that his plan miscarried and that in consequence of his rashness the Master whom he loved had been put to death he committed suicide. Whatever we may think of this view at any rate it supplies good material for a wholesome drama.

Science and Greek

Says the New York Evening Post: "Now that statistics have demonstrated the connection between high marks in college and success in life one is prepared to meet with the further paradox that Greek is the best training in the world for a scientific career." What is paradoxical in either of these propositions it is not easy to perceive. If there were no connection between high marks in college and success in life there would be very little demand for higher education. And as to the study of Greek there is certainly nothing to surpass it for the training it affords not only for a scientific but for any other kind of career. It is especially valuable for those who have marked out for themselves a career of speculation and research in natural science because scientists not of the first order of genius are seldom able to understand that there are real and important interests for mankind outside the limits of their own special study. There are few Darwins in any generation, and scientific men of the secondary order are usually indifferent to everything beyond the region of ascertained or ascertainable phenomena. Their state of mind is typified by that of a distinguished geologist who regarded landscape painting as of no value except to represent correctly the facts of stratification. The study of Greek is of value not so much for the mental discipline it affords as for the breadth of mental vision which it insures. The Greek scholar is learned in the recorded wisdom of mankind. The wise men of ancient Greece have cultivated his reason, made him familiar with the first principles of science, supplied him with the knack of seeing things as they are and improved both his judgment and his discretion.

The Senatorial Contest

As the reason why John D. Works should be elected to the United States Senate are not so plentiful as blackberries we should perhaps make some allowance for the gentlemen who are solemnly affecting conviction of the justice of his claim. At the same time we must compassionate the members of the Legislature who are to be whipped into line for Mr. Works's benefit. For these statesmen are expected to conciliate at once their conscience and their constituents. Naturally they look to their party leaders for argument on which to justify their conduct, and what they get is what Shakespeare pronounces a woman's reason—"I think him so because I think him so." Until a week or so ago the party leaders were arguing with all the earnestness of apparent sincerity that Mr. Works was entitled to the toga under the "advisory vote" law, and despite the manifest untenableness of their position they stuck to it desperately and so clouded the issue that it seemed as though they might win on a technicality without having fastened on them the charge of unscrupulousness. But they appear to have lost their audacity at the eleventh hour. Now we find that they prefer to be logical, the result being that they are reasoning correctly from a false principle, thus attaining what is said to be the perfection of sophistry. The keynote artist in this new dialectic symphony is Mr. Chester Rowell, publicist and patriot of Fresno. "Let's try to do a little clear thinking on this senatorial muddle," say Mr. Rowell with shrewdly affected frankness; and then after a few introductory observations in which he postulates the peculiar fitness of Mr. Works he sets forth a the premiss of his argument, the proposition that the "advisory vote" law is no binding on the conscience of the legislature. In maintaining this proposition Mr. Rowell is not very clear in his exposition. He slides into gratuitous and absurd assertions after the manner of one who has neglected to cultivate that high moral habit, the constant preference of truth. For example he assumes that the legislature is not a continuous body, that what the Legislature of 1909 did the Legislature of 1911 has the right to ignore. He assumes also that it is within the power of a legislative body to assume the judicial prerogative and pronounce a statute invalid. Upon the strength of this assumption he maintains that the gentlemen now at Sacramento have the right to take judicial notice of the fact that the "advisory vote" law was designed to befuddle both the people and the Legislature. Finally he assumes that an act of the Legislature may be considered invalid when in somebody's judgment it does not embody the will of the people. In his judgment the people did not want the advisory plan. Therefore he pronounces it invalid. Obviously Mr. Rowell's whole argument utterly disregards the principle that the members of the Legislature are the people's representatives and that when they make law they are merely acting for the people. We have always understood that an act of the Legislature must be considered an act of the people, and that the only way of ascertaining whether it is contrary to the will of the people is to subject it to judicial process with a view to finding whether it cannot be squared with the Constitution which is the only living expression of the will of the people. If we are to take Mr. Rowell's view of the matter and hold that the Legislature can go behind the law, then we must be prepared for nothing short of confusion worse confounded. But Mr. Rowell's argument we find is to be accepted for the purposes of the moral leaders of the Lincoln-Roosevelt movement. Hardly had Mr. Rowell uttered himself when the editor of the Boughten Bulletin took his cue and echoed the sentiments of his Fresno confrere. "Did the people of California want the advisory vote amendment?" asks the boughten journalist, and in the same breath he makes reply: "No." Nothing easier, apparently, for certain anointed ones to ask the people a question and get an answer suitable to their purpose. We much regret that lacking their gift we cannot gratify our curiosity as to what the people may think of the statesmen who will obey the behest of the honorable, virtuous and clear minded gentlemen now engaged in purifying our politics.

Let Us Have Light

The probability is that before long the people will have submitted to them a proposition to amend the Constitution by providing for the election of United States

enators by direct vote. The question is one that should be passed upon without delay. For we should know whether the people are in favor of extinguishing a vital principle of the Constitution which seems to have fallen into disrepute in several States, and which at any rate is no longer universally applied. If the people are dissatisfied with the government as at present constituted they should make such alterations as are desirable and in the manner prescribed by the organic law. It is not to their interest to evade the law or to ignore the law. The Constitution serves a most important purpose. It is essential to the orderly management of public affairs. It keeps us out of anarchy, it restrains us from drifting into chaos, it enables us to distinguish the voice of the people from the clamor of the mob. At present nobody knows whether the people of the United States are in favor of changing the character of the legislative branch of the government. It is assumed by some of our politicians and editors that the people are very much dissatisfied with the present mode of electing senators, and that they are eager to destroy the distinctive character of the two Houses of Congress by making both directly responsive to the will of the people, but whether this assumption is well founded we cannot ascertain except by employing the machinery of election. In some States the people have expressed themselves in favor of electing senators by direct vote, but amending the Constitution is another matter. It is a very solemn matter that calls for deliberation and sober judgment. According to Judge Story in his work on the Constitution the framers of that great masterpiece of statesmanship provided the power of amendment as "a safety valve to let off temporary effervescences and excitements." He tells us that knowing the besetting sins of republics to be "a restlessness of temperament and a spirit of discontent at slight evils" they prescribed a mode of amending the Constitution which would insure calmness of deliberation and the defeat of the vicious projects of selfish demagogues. Now the probability is that when it is proposed to amend the Constitution for the purpose of increasing the power of the people the vital importance of the principle on which the Senate is at present constituted will be made so clear that the amendment will fail of ratification by the necessary three-fourths of the States. It must be admitted, however, that the fate of other republics warns us to be apprehensive. Republics usually perish by their own hands, and almost invariably as a consequence of the people becoming a prey to fawning sycophants by whom they are persuaded to take more power. The framers of our Constitution were familiar with the history of republics, they knew that in republics the discontents of a day outweigh all solid principles and institutions of government, and nobody can study the arguments they advanced in support of the principle upon which the Senate is constituted without perceiving that they had good reason for regarding it as absolutely essential to the stability of the nation.

The Slumming of Moralists

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I read in the Examiner the other day that Mr. Rudolph Spreckels and Mr. James D. Phelan were the escorts one night last week of a party of ladies at one of the gay beach resorts and that they participated in the festivities of the place. I sincerely trust that the Examiner is in error. Mr. Spreckels and Mr. Phelan are the leading moralists and reformers of this city, and as such they must be sensible of their great responsibility as exemplars of right conduct. I am not a Puritan, I have no prejudice against men who gratify their taste for the sort of entertainment that is characteristic of our so-called night life, but I think it is hardly the proper thing for men in whose judgment the people have confidence to introduce ladies to such scenes as are witnessed in our wayside resorts. It is notorious that those resorts are supported by men and women whom the average self-respecting individual would not care to introduce to the members of his family. One cannot visit those resorts without appearing to be the associate of the habitués and thus give countenance to the kind of sociability that is there indulged. I know that in our absurd smart set there are young persons who think it smart to go slumming, but even among them few there are who would dance the turkey-trot or any other kind of dance in a beach resort and thus figure among the public entertainers.

The Arithmetic of Hearst

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Sitting in the St. Charles Hotel last night, eager for news from California, I carefully perused the latest copies to hand of both the San Francisco and the Los Angeles Examiner. These accounts differed in one important particular. The San Francisco Examiner stated that the songbird had an audience of 250,000. The Los Angeles Examiner said that she sang to 75,000. As both accounts of the affair must have emanated from Hearst's San Francisco office I am considerably puzzled to account for the discrepancy in figures. It is evident that 175,000 people disappeared while the news of that affair was being wired to Los Angeles. Or were they eliminated in Hearst's Los Angeles office? And if so, why? Is Hearst afraid to tell his Los Angeles readers that 250,000 people gathered at Lotta's Fountain? or didn't he believe the statement in the San Francisco Examiner? Did he think that 75,000 was the correct figure? Then why did he add 175,000 to it in the San Francisco Examiner? Doesn't Mr. Hearst make a practice of telling the Los Angeles people the same things that he tells the San Francisco people? Is news a matter of environment with him? I don't know whether you can answer these questions, but I am so bewildered that I must ask them to set my mind at rest. I promise not to tell the New Orleans boosters anything about this.

Very respectfully,

—A Traveling San Franciscan.

Oh, Such a Smash!

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Last week I read in the columns of your journal, those devoted to social news, that Mrs. Carolan was "saturating her soul in European culture;" also that with the approach of the aviation meet "the necessity for solving a vexatious etymological problem increases" and that this problem must be solved in society. I am curious to know whether the writer is in earnest or playful. I am not a stranger to the fashionable herd of this city. I have met some of the richest members thereof in the drawing rooms of Burlingame and in the Burlingame Club, and I know of no harder task than that of bringing the mind down to the level of inanity along which the conversation of the smart setters flows. I don't believe the average member of the fashionable herd of this city knows what an etymological problem is, and I am sure the solving of one would never engage the attention of the fashionable persons I have met. I don't believe that Mrs. Carolan is steeping her soul in culture. If such a thing had been said of Agnes Tobin I should have believed it. Agnes Tobin is a brilliant woman, one of the most brilliant conversationalists I have met anywhere, and down at Burlingame where they talk mostly of dress, servants and automobiles she is regarded as eccentric. There are some cultured women in San Francisco, but I know of only three in what is called high society. Few have either brains or sympathies. In the younger set one hears nothing but vapid, soulless chat. It's a fribble set and fribble talk is the vernacular. I have heard a great deal about "our club wits," and I have met them, and they have amazed me. There is one club which I was told was becoming famous for its wits. I have visited it and I have found it drenched with a flood of nonsense and small jocularity.

Our Backwardness in Military Aviation

Under this title the New York Sun calls attention to a weak spot in our study of the art of war, as follows:

"Secretary Dickinson says in his annual report that the United States was the first nation 'officially to recognize the aeroplane for military purposes.' Mr. Dickinson refers to the flights made by Mr. Orville Wright at Fort Myer in 1908 and to the purchase by the Government of one aeroplane. The reminiscence would be very gratifying if the War Department had continued its studies in heavier than air flying machines, had purchased more aeroplanes, and had trained officers and men to operate them. Our aeronautical equipment consists of one small practice dirigible balloon, one Wright aeroplane and three small captive balloons. In the meantime European Governments have left the United States far in the rear in military aviation."

The Sun gives figures to show European superiority in this respect and concludes:

"The heavier than air machine has already made a place for itself in military equipment; it has become indispensable to an army operating in the field; and the comforting fact, from the military point of view, that this country is 3,000 miles from Europe and 6,000 or more from the coast of Asia should not be cited to excuse any further delay in training the Signal Corps in the use of the aeroplane."

Patriotism and Italian Universities

A considerable stir in Italian universities has been caused by the decision of the Government that professors must take the oath required of all employees of the State. This oath, which in form dates back to the unification of Italy, runs as follows: "I swear to be faithful to the King and his royal successors. . . and to discharge all of my official duties with an eye single to the inseparable well-being of King and country." The point is that not a few university professors in Italy are Socialists or Republicans, and cannot take this oath without mental reservations. It is something which has not been asked of them hitherto as, indeed, the laws relating to education seem clearly to differentiate the occupants of university chairs from other public employees. To emphasize the absurdity of the requirement, it is pointed out that several professors in Italian universities are foreigners; they certainly cannot be compelled to swear allegiance to Victor Emmanuel and the royal family. Prof. Luigi Einaudi of the University of Turin has an article of vigorous protest in the Corriere della Sera, arguing with abundant citation of the statutes that the oath in question was never intended for teachers, and calling upon the authorities to recede from a position which would be a reproach to the nation and "disastrous to the liberty of learning."

Don't Want to be Called "Phelan"

From the Fresno Republican I learn that a good-natured attempt of the Southern Pacific to perpetuate the name of "Phelan" by giving it to a town is being resented by the people of the little hamlet. Says the Republican:

"Strathmore people are excited over a report which emanated early in the week from the headquarters of the Southern Pacific Railroad to the effect that the name of the new citrus town is to be changed from Strathmore to Phelan. The reason given by the railroad people for this proposed change is that there is a town on the coast by the name of Strathen which is so similar to that of the Tulare County town that confusion of mail matter has already resulted. Already a petition has been circulated which has been liberally signed throughout this county protesting against the change. As the question will be eventually taken up with the postoffice department, the protest will be addressed to Uncle Sam. Set forth as the main reason against the proposed change is the fact that Strathmore is beginning to be known; that it won the first prize at the Tulare County Citrus Fair, and that money has been liberally spent by the Chamber of Commerce in advertising the community. Change in the name of the town at this time will mean that all this money will be practically thrown away."

An Anti-nicotine Argument

Those who are opposed to the public toleration of women smokers may find the following which I have culled from a Chicago paper an argument in support of their position:

"Fondness for her cornob pipe cost the life yesterday of Mrs. Bertha E. Byers, 81 years old. Daniel Lynch, 72 years old, who was smoking with her in his flat, was severely burned trying to save her. The fire partially destroyed the tenement, and seventeen families were forced into the street. Mrs. Byers had gone to the Lynch apartment, as was her custom, for a quiet smoke with her old friend. She sat by the window and fire from her pipe dropped into the lace curtains. The curtain blazed up suddenly and her clothing was ignited. She died despite Lynch's efforts to save her."

Of course the same thing might have happened if this woman had been smoking a dainty cigarette—or even if she had been a mere man. The argument will cover a multitude of conditions.

The Booster Worm Turns

"Even Los Angeles," says the San Bernardino Sun, "has turned thumbs down for something that beats the record. We have grown so used to hearing of what Los Angeles and California does that no place else ever dreamed of matching that this comes as a sudden shock. A Pasadena millionaire wanted to break the building record and erect a monument in the shape of a skyscraper on Broadway. Within 24 hours after his announcement, another Los Angeles corporation saw him and raised the bet by 10 stories, offering to erect a 25-story skyscraper if the limit were taken off. And the Council by a vote of eight to one, voted to keep the limit right where it is.

How they ever did it will be one of the unexplained mysteries, but they did, and the sane people of the Angel City seem to approve."

This is a remarkable occurrence, but not entirely unexplainable. It is not that Los Angeles loves its commerce less, but its sunshine more. There is more money in the sunshine.

Seattle and the Blondes

The Town Crier of Seattle is never so interesting as when he puts aside his bell and waxes philosophical. Witness:

"It may be hard for Puget Sounders, in these days of fog melting into rain, to appreciate the value of these opaque meteorological phenomena. It is a good time to read the theories of Gobineau de Laponge and Ammon, recently resurrected by Dr. Charles L. Woodruff, as to the salubrity of the moist, nebulous climates, as compared with the lands of the glorious sun. According to opaque anthropologists, the natural habitat of the white race is in the fog-swept region of the Baltic. It was this part of Europe, and not the high plateau of Thibet, that formed the cradle of the true Aryan race. The blondish, phlegmatic type was indeed the selective product of the prehistoric climate of the British-Scandinavia region, a climate more humid than at present and with far less extremes of temperature, in fact glorified elongation, for the full year through, of a typical foggy day in Seattle. Hot climate paint the skin black, bright dry light paints it brown, and the frigid temperatures also produce a darkish pigmentation. An immediate effect of this sort is noted on the epidermis of each individual subjected to any of these several climatic environments. But the racial effect is, of course, the result of a selective process working through many generations. That is, the type of pigmentation best suited to each particular climate survive and becomes prevalent while the unsuitable type gradually disappear. The climate of Yuma, for example, will ultimately breed a brunette citizen ship, that of Seattle will breed a race of blondes.

III—CHESTER H. ROWELL

By Edward F. O'Day

Chester H. Rowell of Fresno has two curious distinctions—he is the highest high brow in California politics and he is the only man in the State who is constantly mistaken for his own uncle. Not that Chester H. Rowell and Dr. Chester Rowell look alike, talk alike, think alike or even do politics alike. Far from it. The total personality and the avuncular personality have as little in common as a Fresno raisin and an Illinois buckeye. But Dr. Rowell has been identified with Fresno so long that when the name of Rowell is mentioned everybody thinks that the Doctor is meant. As a matter of fact, when the name of Rowell is mentioned nowadays, it is pretty safe to say that the Doctor is not meant; for the Doctor is getting old and his nephew is doing all the things that are getting the family name into the newspapers. In fact, it is hardly going too far to say that if Chester H. Rowell keeps up his present gait the day may come when people will mistake his uncle for him. Meanwhile he is known as "Chet." Not that people call him "Chet" to his face. Mercy no! Those who would be willing to call him that with just a slight tinge of derision very rarely meet him and his familiars have too much respect for him. "Chet" is an easy way of referring to him in casual conversation, but it would sound ridiculous as a form of address. You might just as well speak lightly of the Quator or nickname Mesopotamia. To his friends Chester Rowell is a high brow and you cannot call a high brow "Chet."

To realize that Chester Rowell is a high brow you have only to inspect his counterfeit presentment. Note that bulging forehead and that retreating hair. Nature made Rowell a high brow and he has been improving on nature for a good many years. He had outdistanced most of our high brows before he went into politics and as he has continued to burn the midnight oil, even in the hottest season of the campaign, he must have accorded the rank of premier among our political high brows. Which, when you come to think it over, is not much of a distinction, for California politics has never been strong on university degrees.

Chester H. Rowell was born in Bloomington, Illinois, in 1867. That was an auspicious beginning. Bloomington, it will be recalled, gave Margaret Illington to the world and to Daniel Bohman. It also gave Adlai Stevenson to the Democratic party and to literature and furnished two or three governors to Illinois. A little village near Bloomington gave Melville Stone to the Associated Press and Elbert Hubbard to the Philistines. Going back a little further, Bloomington was the stamping ground of Abe Lincoln whose early days it was a political hotbed. The old men of Chester Rowell's boyhood were Lincoln's pals. His father was in Congress for many years. Is it any wonder that he became a politician?

But if environment made him a politician, it must be remembered that nature which is stronger than environment, had constituted him a high brow, and nature held environment at bay for some time. Rowell went through the Illinois State Normal School and still thirsting for the Pierian Spring, passed on to the University of Michigan. He graduated there at the age of twenty-one, a fact which will not be incorrectly interpreted if taken to mean that he was exceeding the speed limit of education. Still unsatisfied he did post-graduate work at the university and having squeezed its culture dry, went on to Washington. The congressman, his father, had him appointed a committee clerk and young Rowell stayed at the capital for three years. That was during the czardom of Tom Reed and the excitement of the Force Bill which, by the way, Congressman Rowell wrote. During those three years he learned many things that were not included in university curricula but which subsequently proved very valuable in his California political experience. The advantage of being a high brow in politics is that you get into the habit of tabulating your discoveries and filing them away for future reference.

Politics had not yet taken its hold on Rowell and after three years in Washington he went to Europe in quest of more educational worlds to conquer. He spent two years in studying—what? If you are a politician you will never guess. He studied philosophy and Germanic philology. He studied them in Halle, in Berlin, in Paris and in Rome and when he got through he could read all the languages of Europe west of Russia, modern and medieval, knew medieval literature backwards and could speak German, French and Italian. Is it any wonder that the Rowell brow bulges? Is it any wonder that his friends never call him "Chet" to his face? Is it any wonder that the editorials in the Fresno Republican frequently pass over the heads of the simple rustics of the raisin belt? But I am ahead of my story.

Chester Rowell returned to the United States, got his modern and medieval languages safely through the Custom House and went to teach German and mathematics in a little Kansas college. Then he taught at Racine for a time. Next, at the solicitation of his uncle, he crossed the continent and gave two years to the pupils of the Fresno High School. Tiring of that, he returned and highbrowed the students of the University of Illinois for a year. Meanwhile he had married and his wife's health being delicate, he resolved to set up his lares, penates and modern and medieval tongues permanently in California. He would have obtained a chair at the University of California, but Dr. Rowell was a regent and no relative of a regent may occupy a position at Berkeley, so Chester Rowell became a newspaperman. The Fresno Republican had been established by his uncle and after various vicissitudes, had become a very desirable journalistic property. Chester Rowell took charge of it in 1898 and has been running it ever since.

Has he run it successfully? Well, Rowell is free to admit that up to 1898 Fresno had been a strong Democratic county and he will not deny that Fresno has since that time shown vigorous Republican tendencies and performances; so if you wish to give the Fresno Republican part of the credit for the change, you will not excite his choler. Neither will he refuse to admit that his paper has worked one or two little reforms in the county. Fresno was a wide open town when Chester Rowell got there, but one of the first things he did was to inform the good people of the town that the medieval and modern authors together with a lot of other authorities were dead against a wide open town. It was a hard fight, but the lid was finally clamped down on Fresno in 1901. Meanwhile Rowell had been to Washington as a sort of political adviser to Senator Bard and the experience aroused whatever political tendencies were still dormant in his breast. He made the fight for a new charter for Fresno and when that fight was won and the time came to elect Fresno's first mayor, he was a candidate on the republican ticket. Rowell jokes about that campaign nowadays, but there was nothing funny about it while it lasted. There was the usual assortment of campaign lies, canards, equivocations and roorbacks and the mean temperature of Fresno has been higher ever since. When the smoke cleared away L. O. Stephens, Rowell's democratic opponent, was sitting in the mayor's chair and Rowell was proffering him the support of the Republican.

Rowell has been fighting ever since, but without losing his temper. He got into raisin politics by daring to question the infallibility of M. Theo Kearney, the grand mogul of the raisin kingdom, and Kearney, who was not used to being crossed, declared that California was not big enough to hold both Rowell and himself. They were still at it six years later when Kearney died.

In 1907 Rowell went up to Sacramento to look over the Legislature. He didn't like the looks of it. There wasn't a man in it who could read the medieval languages, but there were a lot of senators and assemblymen who could see the semaphore with their eyes closed. Being a high brow in literature and journalism is pretty much the same as being a reformer in politics and Rowell had acquired the habit of rolling his r's gustfully when he talked about reform. So he resolved to reform the Legislature and incidentally the Republican politics of the State. He talked it over with E. T. Earl of the Los Angeles

SAN FRANCISCO

The Abyss

By Maurice Trubert (From the French)

Last year I was one of a group of men who were talking of the Carlist war of 1873-6

After listening to the different opinions expressed for and against that uprising, so fruitful in glorious exploits and sorrowful memories, a white-haired diplomat, Count P——, celebrated for his strange adventures in foreign countries, joined in the conversation.

"What you say, gentlemen, touches me closely, for I, too, have personal recollections of that war. With your permission I will relate what happened to me during an excursion to Spain."

The proposal was accepted with enthusiasm, and the count related the following:

"Having obtained leave of absence, I decided on a trip to the Pyrennees. Would you believe I had never yet seen them? So full of charm did I find the mountain scenery that, having arrived at Bagneres-de-Luchon, I decided to cross the frontier. The savage grandeur of that mountain range and its immediate vicinity, a love for the unexpected, and an innate curiosity for everything outside the commonplace, urged me on. Ah, how I regretted it!

"I sent for G——, one of the best guides of Bagneres. He was a man between fifty and fifty-five years of age, tall, muscular, with that quiet energy peculiar to those who live in the midst of danger. At first, he made some objection; the district beyond Venasque was altogether unknown to him; besides, bands of Carlists roamed over the whole country along the frontier. But the chink of gold proved to be a good argument, and he consented, provided he could take with him his two sons, strong young fellows in picturesque costumes.

"We loaded two mules with provisions for eight days. Armed with revolvers and carbines, each of us rode one of those keen-eyed, sure-footed mountain ponies that recoil before no obstacle. But we committed an unpardonable error in not providing ourselves with passports which would have saved us, if not from great danger, at least from numerous difficulties in a country overrun by troopers.

"At the close of the first day, after a wearisome climb to reach Venasque, we crossed the Spanish frontier. We passed the night rather comfortably in the hospital picturesquely situated on the opposite mountain slope. From that point, we took the roughest paths, guided only by a traveler's fancy. The weather was fine, the sky clear, and we forged ahead rapidly, hoping to come to a hamlet, or even to a hut where we could spend the night.

"The massive heights of the Maladetta rose before me, filling my soul with wonder and admiration, as I stood gazing upon the wilderness and the beauty of the magnificent spectacle. On all sides opened broad chasms, while from the heights fell cascades, dashing and foaming from rock to rock, and wide-mouthed caverns offered shelter in their mysterious depths. Enormous birds of prey hovered over the precipices, while far away sounded the pipes of a shepherd whose sorrowful notes were in harmony with the wilderness of the scene. Nearby, the chamois leaped down the steep mountain sides, not unlike some great bird deprived of its wings.

"The voice of the guide roused me.

"Forward; we must find shelter for the night."

"I urged on my pony. About five in the afternoon we began to notice irrefutable signs of the passage of Carlist bands. Here and there were ruined tents, broken weapons, the carcasses of horses and balls incrusting the rocks. My guides looked on with interest, but without surprise. The proximity of danger awakened in their rude hearts no sentiment of fear. Before going farther I asked the guide:

"Well, G——, what do you think? Shall we turn back, or go on heedless of the indications?"

"That depends upon the value you place upon your life—and upon ours!" was the tranquil answer.

"All through my nerves ran a slight spasm which I controlled on the moment. Had I not wished for the unexpected, and was it not too late to retreat? I gave orders for the forward march. Now and then the guide softly whistled a Gascon air, but his sons and I kept silent, for we felt the proximity of danger.

"At any moment we might meet the Spaniards, and, thanks to our lack of passports, be taken prisoners and shot on the spot. Besides, the night was coming with that rapidity characteristic of the mountains. Not a ray of sunshine penetrated to the bottom of the gap along which we were going slowly. Suddenly the voice of the guide far ahead broke the silence.

"I see a house, sir; yonder to the left."

"At the height of six hundred meters, as if hanging to the side of the mountain, I saw a hut already wrapped in shadow.

"Very well! Let us climb up there!" I called out.

"Good! But how?" asked G——.

"One of his sons approached and pointed out a rough, narrow path that led from the foot of the mountain up the side, and passed in front of the hut. The path was so steep that it seemed perpendicular. Leaving our ponies and the mules in charge of the young mountaineers, G—— and I clambered up the airy path to the hut.

"Do you think it is occupied?" I asked my guide.

"I think not; and if it were, I should be surprised. These huts are to shelter the shepherds lost on the mountains, or overtaken by a storm. But we shall soon know."

"The next moment we stood before the hut. Suspended over an abyss six hundred meters in depth, it was silent as G—— had foreseen, but on trying to open the door, there came from within a terrible cry. It was so full of anguish and fear, that the guide was seized with sudden emotion.

"Well! We are deceived!" I whispered in his ear.

"Yes, and to judge by the sound of the voice, it is a woman's cry. Let us break in the door."

"It gave way easily and we entered the cabin. It was a low, smoky room, with a narrow opening that led to an upper room. Scarcely had we mounted a few steps when another cry sounded and a man appeared above. He was young, dark, with black hair framing energetic features. With sinister expression, he covered us with his revolver. In the other hand gleamed a knife.

"I had learned to speak Spanish in Lima, so I hastened to call out:

"Friends; we wish you no harm."

"The drawn expression of his features disappeared. He came towards us, and in a gentle voice said:

"You frightened us, Micaela and me, for we thought you were Carlists."

"What! Are you a Liberal?"

"No, sir; I am a deserter from the Carlists."

"As I expressed surprise, he added:

"Oh, it is more frequent than you think. During the last fifteen days, many soldiers have done the same, but it is a great risk. If I fall into the hands of my former companions, I am lost. So, thanks to the kindness of a few shepherds, I am here with Micaela, and you can judge of her terror when she heard you knock on the door."

"While he was talking there appeared in the shadows a beautiful creature. Tall and slender, energy and strength were expressed in every line of the young woman. Her black hair fell like a mantle over her shoulders; two large, dark eyes lighted a face whose warm brown skin robbed its secret from the sun. Add youth and I know not what special grace that left us speechless."

"Sir," said the deserter, "let us go down, if you wish, in a few words, I will tell you the story."

"With the courtesy of a man of the world, he stood to one side while the young woman and I passed down into the lower room.

"I am," said he, "the son of a rich merchant of Saragossa, and a decided partisan of King Carl I had recently married Micaela, when the war broke out, and in spite of the ties that should have kept me at home, I obeyed a force stronger than my will, and joined the rebellion. I was named ensign of one of the largest regiments and fought in twenty engagements, now victorious, now defeated, fleeing before the enemy. At last, wearied with the dreadful scenes of which I was a daily witness, I deserted about three weeks ago. Since then, I have lived here in momentary fear of being made a prisoner."

"Poor Micaela!" said he, caressing her silken tresses. "She learned through the newspaper that Ensign Juan d'Estella had fled towards the French frontier. She did not hesitate a moment and one fine morning she arrived here bleeding and exhausted. She had wandered over the mountains for eight days until Providence directed her to this hut."

"How is it that, being so near the French frontier, you have not crossed it?" I again asked.

"I was wounded in the leg and it would have been impossible to walk for two days."

"As he spoke, he rose and I noticed that he limped painfully.

"Well, we have come in time, thanks to the horses, which you will mount. In twenty-four hours you will be in France."

"A cry of joy burst from the lips of the young wife. At that moment, the guide approached and whispered to me.

"I hear a noise on the mountain; probably it is a Carlist detachment. But silence! I do not wish to alarm the young woman, who might willingly betray us."

"Those words made me shudder. Was it unfortunate to be torn from us just when we were about to save him? I rose hurriedly.

"What is the matter?" asked Juan in surprise.

"Nothing; I am going to order them to get the horses ready; every minute is precious."

"I left the hut. It was a dark night. Beneath the platform, under our feet, was a black abyss over which was leaning the guide, listening, touched his shoulder.

Perspective Impressions

Now let us see what good can come out of Sacramento when the men who are better than the neighbors are on the job.

Among the measures promised by the new legislature is a constitutional amendment to permit judges to charge juries on matters of fact as well as of law. This is strange in view of what we are told is the prevalent sentiment—that common sense has vanished from the bench and resides only among the people.

We shall not have safe and sane aviation until pecuniary rewards for merely spectacular achievements are prohibited by law.

Mr. Meyer Lissner solemnly asserts that he will have nothing to do with patronage. Mr. Lissner's only ambition is to acquire the reputation of being a wholly disinterested patriot, and at present he's as pregnant with good resolutions as the platform committee of a populist convention.

The aeroplane is rapidly making the automobile seem like a life-saving machine.

Says the Call: "In the palmiest day of Herrin's control of machine legislatures Walter Parker, his Los Angeles boss, never drove his legislative tools more brutally or half as frankly as Meyer Lissner, chairman of the Republican State Central Committee, is now doing in his efforts to force senators to violate their obligations to their constituents." This is both treason and slander.

The Spectator

A Boon to San Francisco

One of the most important things that was done for the people of San Francisco immediately after the calamity of 1906 was that for which we are all indebted to that distinguished lawyer, Gaetano W. McEnerney, the commemoration of whom has been insured by the Supreme Court of the United States which has affirmed the validity of the act of the legislature that bears his name. It was Mr. McEnerney that suggested the solution of most of the problems with which the committee in charge of rehabilitation had to deal in our historic emergency. His was the guiding hand for many days in San Francisco, and fortunate it was that such was the case. When our affairs began to take shape and people began to concern themselves about their property interests, great was the consternation of many when they realized that most of the title records in the City Hall had been destroyed. Before them was the prospect of confusion and irreparable loss. About that time a title insurance company came forward and promised to restore many records but at a prodigious cost to the people. It was in this emergency that Mr. McEnerney conceived the idea which has proved so great a boon to property owners. Not only did he find a way of enabling people to prove their titles, but at the same time he redeemed them from the uncertainties of a system under which it was never absolutely safe to purchase real estate on this peninsula. Prior to the passage of the McEnerney Act property was purchased at the risk of a flaw in the title, against which, it is true, some company would insure the purchaser, but there was nobody to insure the company. The McEnerney Act was regarded by the title insurance companies as a blow at their business, and they pronounced it unconstitutional. Furthermore on the advice and assurance of prominent attorneys they promised to have it declared unconstitutional, and to that end framed up a case which they carried through all the courts, State and Federal, meeting Mr. McEnerney in every one of them and suffering defeat all along the line. The decision of the Supreme Court, which has not yet been transmitted, will doubtless prove of great importance not only to San Francisco but to every State that has adopted the Torrens system of registering land titles, as the principles of that system are involved in the McEnerney Act.

The Inaugural Ball, An Explanation

So little is known of the personal traits, of the modes of thought and of the bent of sentiment you are satisfied with nothing but the best, will use only "KOH-I-NOOR" Pencils. Made in Austria. Sold and used everywhere.—H. S. Cocker Co., 460 Market St., San Francisco.

that distinguish our governor-elect from other men that any anecdote which throws light upon his individuality is sure of a welcome. For this reason I beg leave to hark back to his much discussed declination of an inaugural ball. This is a subject which has been so often treated that it really belongs to the realm of anecdote and I am bringing it forth only because I can shed new light upon the theme and upon the character of Johnson at one and the same time. I have been informed upon what seems very creditable authority that Governor-elect Johnson conveyed to Victor Hatfield, the chairman of the citizens' inaugural ball committee of Sacramento, the real reason why he refused to grace such a function. This reason, as quoted to me, has nothing to do with the desire for a modest inauguration, but was expressed substantially as follows: "As the guest of honor," the governor-elect is quoted as saying, "I of course could not control the list of invited guests and undoubtedly men who had opposed me politically would be invited. I would either have to meet these men socially or show them a marked public discourtesy. I do not want to show them a marked public discourtesy and I absolutely refuse to meet them socially. I don't intend to speak to them during my four years as governor."

An Apparent Contradiction

Now this story has been communicated to me as containing naught but the strictest verity; yet am I forced to consider the possibility that the governor-elect has been misquoted or misunderstood. There is always that possibility when the utterances of public men are passed from lip to lip. In this present case there is particular reason for suspecting that the governor's explanation has been misconstrued, because that explanation is diametrically opposed in word and spirit to a more recent utterance of the governor-elect. Speaking to the members of the legislature and to the state central committeemen who gathered at the Palace Hotel under the wand of Meyer Lissner to facilitate the work of lawmaking, Johnson had something to say of those same men who had opposed him politically. It was this: "I don't care what their previous affiliations have been, I am going to Sacramento with the hope and the belief that every man is going forward with us to make this government responsive to the people and the people only. And I am going to believe that of every man until he proves the contrary by his own acts." Obviously this statement does not square with the one supposed to have been made to Victor Hatfield. On the theory that that statement was actually made to Hatfield by Johnson we must infer one of three things; that Johnson meant what he said to Hatfield and did not mean what he said at the Palace, that Johnson was sincere at the Palace and was only bluffing Hatfield, or that his attitude veered like a weather-cock between the time of the two statements. We must wait for further light on the Johnsonian personality before deciding.

Johnson and the Reporters

Meanwhile every little Johnsonian action has a meaning all its own for those who are trying to estimate his calibre. Take for instance the story of his conversation with a newspaperman in Washington. The newspaperman was a Californian and met Johnson one morning in the New Willard Hotel. They chatted. "There have been a lot of Washington newspapermen and photographers looking for you, Mr. Johnson," this newspaperman remarked; "when they apply to me, as they are constantly doing, where shall I tell them to look for you?" Johnson flared up. "They must await my pleasure," he cried; "they shall see me in my own time." When the newspaperman pointed out that reporters and photographers were busy men and not masters of their time, Johnson launched forth in a diatribe against the journalism of today and ended with this statement: "The newspapers have had altogether too much to do with running the government of California. When I am governor of California they will get out of my office just what I see fit to give them and no more."

His Reception of a Cub

Still another story about the new governor has come to my ears. It concerns the reception accorded by Johnson to a reporter sent to interview him after his election on behalf of the defunct Morning Sun. The Sun, as a Democratic paper, was an eager supporter of Theodore Bell during the campaign, but naturally, when Bell was defeated, the city editor of the Sun was anxious to place before his readers the post-election statement of his triumphant opponent. So he sent a reporter to see Johnson. It happened that this reporter was an undersized cub, a boy making his first acquaintance with journalism. When he had been admitted to Johnson's presence and had explained his mission, the governor-elect glared at him. "Get out," he cried, "and get out quick! I should use physical violence on you, but I am going to restrain myself and only say to you, Get out and get out quick." And being an unsophisticated cub, the reporter fled.

Johnson and Kent at Outs

I am informed that relations are strained between Governor-elect Johnson and Congressman-elect Kent of the second district. I am surprised to hear this because it seems to me that Johnson has every reason to feel appreciative toward the millionaire reformer of Kentfield and Chicago. For "Bill" Kent opened a sack of $6,500 to assist the Johnson campaign, putting up $2,500 of that amount on election day to pay watchers at the polls in this city. And yet I am told that Johnson is "peevish" at Kent. The explanation is interesting. It is said that Johnson was displeased with the candidate for congress because the latter did not display sufficient alacrity in turning over Gifford Pinchot to the aid and comfort of Johnson. He felt that Kent was keeping Pinchot too much to himself and he regarded that as a bit of selfishness not offset by the gift of that $6,500.

A Patronage Plum From the Bench

Unusual, indeed, remarkably so, was the appointment last week of the Public Administrator of San Francisco as the guardian of the estate of a resident of San Mateo County. Perhaps it will be interpreted as a great compliment to "Laughing Billy" Hynes, the alert gentleman who always has an eye on the morgue and never neglects his opportunities. For his appointment seems to imply that in all San Mateo county there is no man more capable of handling an estate that runs into millions. But implications are misleading. If in this instance we accept what seems to be implied we shall be diverted from contemplation of a set of circumstances that merits reflection. The appointment of Mr. Hynes was made by Judge Maurice T. Dooling of San Benito who was sitting for Judge Buck. Judge Dooling is the distinguished gentleman who came all the way from Hollister to preside over a mock trial at the expense of the people of the State for the benefit of the fragrant editor of the Boughten Bulletin. By the appointment of Mr. Hynes Judge Dooling bestows a valuable favor on Eustace Cullinan and Tommy Hickey, the confidential political agents of the Bulletin coterie of reformers. When "Laughing Billy" Hynes was maneuvered into his job it was for the purpose of giving employment to Cullinan and Hickey and thus providing them with compensation without cost to the sanhedrim of patriots. As attorneys for Hynes they will get a slice of the San Mateo estate which in the judgment of the learned Judge Dooling was in need of a guardian. Thus we glimpse the wheels within wheels of the unusual juridical act by which the public administrator of one county has been made the guardian of the estate of a resident of another county.

A Hint from Washington

A prominent representative of the Washington bureaucracy who was in town last week threw out a hint that might prove of some value were it to be acted upon. He was discussing the contest between this city and New Orleans, which, he said, he had been watching with a great deal of interest, when he was asked what he thought would be the outcome. "I think you could win it," he said, "if you would avail yourselves of your Washington pull." Asked to explain, he went on to say that argument doesn't count for much in such a contest as we are engaged in, that what is needed is plain, everyday political influence. "It's all right enough," he said, "to send on your merchants who like the limelight and to be glorified in the papers in which they advertise their wares, but one experienced politician with a knowledge of the ropes could do more in Washington than the owners of all your department stores. You have two Senators in Washington who have more power than the Senators of half a dozen Southern States. What are they doing? Has anybody gone on to Washington who knows them intimately and who can rouse them to action? I hear a lot about Kahn, but he's only a congressman, and you know a congressman doesn't count much ice. There's one man in Washington who can turn the tide in the House with a nod, and that man is Postmaster-General Hitchcock, the great manipulator of Republican politics, and I heard that there are few men closer to Hitchcock than the Postmaster of San Francisco. Have you sent your Postmaster to Washington?" The question conveys the hint.

The New Year Celebration

There has been a perceptible evolution in San Francisco's method of celebrating the advent of a new year. When the New Year's Eve celebration first became a popular institution the festivities were confined principally to Mark Twain Square and the thoroughfares around it. Powell and other important thoroughfares were comparatively small numbers of people betaken themselves to the cafes and hotels. Gradually the more exacting class of revelers tired of the boisterous street parade and began spending hours on end in the big dining rooms. At the same time the various districts of the city, like the Mission, Fillmore street and North Beach, elaborated their purely local celebrations. The recent celebration there was more revel than ever in all parts of the city, but the downtown thoroughfares were not as crowded as they used to be. The cafes, on the other hand, and the big hotels were taxed to their utmost capacity. Techau's, Tait's, the Bismarck, the Port and other cafes were thronged with wine-drinking parties which had reserved their accommodations weeks in advance. None of these places had a bit of room to spare. In the St. Francis Hotel eighteen hundred people who had erved table space sped the hours with music, singing and good cheer. I am told that some of the reservations there were made two months in advance for travelers on their way to San Francisco from London, Munich, St. Petersburg, Paris and even from China. In the Palace and the Fairmont the same situation obtained; and the smaller hotels were crowded to the doors.

The Crowd at the Beach

While the more prosperous people seem to have tired a good deal of the street celebration, they have by no means entirely eschewed the open air on this night of San Francisco nights. I don't suppose there was an unused automobile in the city last Saturday night. After a quick spin through the streets every motor caraded for the Park and Ocean Beach. Never before was there such a crowd of motorists at the beach. A motorist who took a party down the beach boulevard comparatively early told me that there were literally thousands of machines there. He said that on his way through the Park he counted nine smashed cars, one of them a taxi. They were not laid up with punctures, he explained, but smashed beyond use. He said a curious person counted one hundred and sixty machines in front of The Lodge, one of the beach resorts; and, that at that rate there must have been three hundred in front of Dibble's and two hundred at the Cliff House when he arrived. He said the flashing to and fro of automobiles along the dark roads of the Park reminded him of nothing so much as of a revel of fireflies.

Are Our People "Flush"?

Considering the really enormous amount of money which must have been spent Saturday night for automobiles and champagne, one would be led to suppose that San Franciscans have all sorts of money to spend. And yet that does not seem to be altogether the case. It is very difficult to make an estimate of the Christmas and New Year holiday trade, but as far as I can learn, it was not as heavy this year as last. Many shopkeepers have told me that while there was a normal number of purchases the amount of the individual purchase was much smaller than usual. From one jeweler I learned that his largest individual sale amounted to $400 and although his is not one of the biggest shops he is used to selling into greater figures than that. A saloonkeeper with a penchant for statistics stated that on three days before Christmas last year he sold over the bar forty-two quarts of champagne, whereas this year he sold only three. But even if the city was a little pinched for money for gifts it seemed to have plenty to spend for its New Year's Eve blowout.

Hail! and Farewell

I quote from a letter which I received this week from Mr. A. J. Pillsbury, editor of the California Weekly:

"The California Weekly ceases publication with this issue. Inability to secure a living advertising patronage in San Francisco and vicinity supplies the all sufficient reason why. . . . If you comment in any way upon this ill-starred venture I shall be glad if you will send a marked copy of your paper to the undersigned at the address given."

The only comment that I care to make is that the California Weekly received very shabby treatment from the gentlemen in whose interest it was started. The California Weekly came into the world to fill a pressing, immediate want, to render a great public service. To be more explicit the purpose of the California Weekly was to counteract the evil influence of Town Talk and all its hebdomadal contemporaries. The founders of the California Weekly had reason to believe that a fine field had been prepared for them by the subsidized organs of the vindictive cabal that once upon a time played havoc with the peace and dignity of this community. They received the impression that what the people wanted was a weekly paper that would take our civic patriots seriously, applaud them and glorify them and boom their propaganda. But they soon found that they had been deceived. The California Weekly languished almost from its inception. Aside from a little boosting it received from the Call and Bulletin very little support came from the element to which it appealed. And now just as the job-chasers of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League plunge their feet in the trough their weekly organ expires of inanition. The fact that the California Weekly never created any stir in the community is most astonishing in view of the abundance of extraordinary talent with which it was supplied. Its staff of writers was larger than that of any weekly paper west of New York. From the letter-head before me I learn that the now defunct journal had not only an editor but an associate editor and two assistant editors, not to mention two Los Angeles journalists who served as directors and doubtless contributed wisdom to the forming of policies. Considering the size of the staff and the size of the paper it goes without saying that no writer was ever called upon to tax his capacity or to do anything but his very best and therefore that everything printed in the California Weekly was worth reading. So it is hard to account for the neglect from which it suffered; especially so when we reflect that the associate editor was none other than the distinguished Chester Rowell of Fresno.

The Retort Frank

After all, frankness has its time and place. I am minded to say this, first of all by the thought that society generally shuns frankness; secondly, because of a recent happening. It was not an important happening. On the contrary, it was quite ordinary. It had to do with an ordinary girl. She is not only ordinary in manner but ordinary in that peculiar fashion which so many of the indiscriminating call good-looking. She has all the common social distinctions nicely balanced and is therefore without distinction. But she rejoices in a good opinion of herself. It was that which made her remark: "How strange that so many people mistake me for Enid Gregg." To which her frank interlocutor replied, "One of the strangest things in the world."

Miss Peters and Her Earrings

Miss Anna Peters of Stockton is really a beautiful girl. I emphasize the fact because to the bavarde all girls are beautiful and there is no discrimination in their use of the term. If Paris had been a bavarde he would have distributed a basket of golden apples; no goddess, however plain, would have been overlooked. But if Miss Peters had been present at that historic—or should we say mythical—function on Mount Ida, Venus would have had a hard time of it. For Miss Peters is the kind of a beauty to make men talk and women hold their peace. I saw her at the Fairmont a few nights ago and she was a wonder of loveliness. She wore a low-cut gown of rose pink chiffon and a small sealskin hat. It was a charming costume. But her earrings were really sensational, if the word may be applied to one of such taste in dress as Miss Peters. They were big and heavy, of East Indian gold, and they almost touched her shoulders. Their design was curious and beautiful. Their dull gold matched her blonde loveliness.

Miss Lally's Fiance

Some are born with a country; some achieve a country; and some have a country thrust upon them. Most of us are in the first class. Madame Tetravini is in the second, and says "San Francisco is my country!" Quite evidently Lewis Durkee, the recently announced fiance of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Thornton Lally's charming daughter Marian, is among the last. The society editresses have heralded the fact that Mr. Durkee is from London and that he "is a young Englishman." Most of us, when we are told that one of the most charming young girls of the smart set is engaged to a young Englishman, picture to ourselves a smart young fellow from Hyde Park or Regent's street. Mr. Durkee is from Regent street, it is true, but Regent street, Alameda. Not that Durkee does not suggest the type of young men familiar in the drawing rooms in the west end of London. He has spent no little time in England and his admiration for that country has perhaps given cause for some slight confusion as to nationality. As a matter of fact, he graduated from the high school in Alameda about seven years ago. The Durkees are an old and well-known family in the Encinal city, but never gave the impression of being English. It is a long road from the east end of Alameda to the west end of London and then to Pacific avenue, but it is probably well worth traveling. Foreign spouses seem to be favored in the Lally family. Maybe that was why the society editors made the mistake. Miss Marian's eldest sister married Henry Lund, son of the Norwegian consul and a local commission merchant. Charlotte Lally, the second daughter, however, married Arthur Kelly and is now a popular Piedmont matron. Evans Lally wedded a pretty French girl.

The Difficulties of a Mere Man

At one of the biggest of the big balls recently a very eligible gentleman was so attracted by the beauty and vivacity of Miss Alexandra Hamilton that he went to a matron whom he knew very well and requested her to present him to the young lady. The matron did not know Miss Hamilton very well, so she thought the introduction would be better managed through one of her girl friends. She asked a young lady to present the bachelor to Miss Hamilton. The young lady declared that she would be charmed to do so immediately after the next dance. But after the next dance she seemed to forget and was so busy that the matron thought it would be a pity to remind her. So instead she asked another girl. This girl gushed that it would delight her to perform the trifling service and she would attend to it at the earliest opportune moment—or words to that general effect. To make a long story short, the ball was nearing an end before the matron realized that she had excited the jealousy of every girl to whom she had made her request and that they were calmly ignoring their promises. So the matron took the situation in both hands and very gracefully performed the introduction herself. This is a story with a purpose, the purpose being to indicate how small minded many society girls must be when they will even vent their jealousy on so generous-minded a girl as Alexandra Hamilton. And such futile jealousy! The silly ma

How About This?

Of the old saying, "one has to go away from home for news," I am reminded by a paragraph in an Eastern paper in which Elyse Schultz is alluded to as "the fiancée of Harrison Fisher," whom, it is said, she captivated on his recent visit to San Francisco in search of a new model for a "Harrison Fisher girl." Is this a joke? Or have I been asleep at the switch? Occasionally the news of an engagement escapes me, and as I do not read the bavarde religiously there may be times when I am wholly oblivious of the doings of Cupid. This may be one of them.

Maybe Related to d'Abruzzi

Some of our leisured people find pleasure in contemplating the possibility that Miss Mary Louise Elkins may some day be related to the Duke d'Abruzzi. The Duke d'Abruzzi, being a gentleman of royal blood, is a subject of interest to many who have never made his acquaintance. Even in San Francisco his is a name to conjure with. This probably indicates that like all provincials he early love a lord. So Miss Elkins assumes unusual importance, for she may some time or other be able to refer in careless conversation to "my relative, d'Abruzzi," if she sees fit. It all depends, of course, on the outcome of the Elkins-Abruzzi romance. Katharine Elkins may not get into the royal family of Italy. But if she does, Mary Louise Elkins will become more interesting than ever to our little aristocracy. And she is an interesting girl. Her gowns are the most stunning that have been seen here in a long time. Her wealth is great, her generosity unbounded. The tea service which she presented to her most intimate friend here, Mrs. Percy Moore, is a marvel of workmanship in silver. But her many connections and possible connections transcend all these things. She has a senator for a father, Senator Felton of San Mateo; her cousin is Senator Elkins of Virginia; and her cousin Katharine only says the word—and gives acceptable to the Quirinal—she will be much more distinguished than some of her present friends will regard her with awe. Indeed, it has been gossiped that her young nephew Steve Elkins, son of the senator, will be a devoted worshiper at the shrine of Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt Jr. if that charming woman ever decides to place a legal barrier between herself and her husband.

He Was the King's Cousin

Sir Ernest Cassel whose retirement from active business in London was recently announced bore a striking resemblance to the late King Edward with whom he was on terms of intimacy and brotherly. Now comes an interesting explanation, by no means new, it is said, but hitherto suppressed. The story as it comes to me is that the King and Sir Ernest were first cousins. The father of Sir Ernest was a Hamburg banker, the son of a Jewish doctor named Cassel who was connected with the small court of Saxony in the days of Ernest I, Duke of Saxony and Gotha. Ernest I was known to be capable of becoming the father of a family, yet his wife, Duchess Louise, had two sons one of whom was Albert "the Good," the consort of the late Queen Victoria. Albert was generally reputed to be the son of Dr. Cassel, and of this Queen Victoria was apprised before her marriage by Lord Melbourne, Prime Minister of England, but she said she didn't care who Albert's father was, she was in love with him and that was sufficient. Dr. Cassel married in Hamburg, and his grandson Sir Ernest, when a young man, was sent to England where he became the intimate friend of Prince Edward of Wales who afterwards became King of England. Edward was anxious to make the man with whom he had a grandmother in common a peer, but was inhibited by the law of England which provides that no man who has not been born a British subject shall be raised to the peerage. It was regarded as corroboration of the story of Albert's parentage that all his children had pronounced Jewish features. This was especially true of King Edward in his later years, as it is also true of Albert's grandson Emperor William.

The Calhoun-Foster Engagement

I dislike to hang out the tattered banner of "I told you so," but I cannot help reminding my dear readers that I was the first to forecast the engagement of Miss Margaret Calhoun to Paul Foster. With that attentive eye to social signs and portents on which I pride myself, I long ago noted the incipient romance. So I must hasten to extend my felicitations. It is a very interesting engagement. Miss Calhoun is a sweet girl who will make a good man happy and Paul Foster, I think I may say without fear of contradiction, is a good man. Perhaps I should adopt the patter of society and remark that he is a bully chap, but the meaning is the same. The union of the Calhoun and Foster families is something of an event in local society. Both are families in which the highest domestic ideals are cultivated. In both families the old-fashioned virtues that bind the older and the younger generation flourish with peculiar vitality. We may look forward to a great deal of entertaining in honor of the young couple.

There Were Men Galore

There were no wall flowers at Miss Dora Winn's party on Tuesday evening. The Broadmans are experienced entertainers and they know how to prevent the catastrophe which has attended some of the other big parties of the season. The catastrophe in all cases was caused by the scarcity of men. But men were not scarce at the Winn ball masque. They were so plentiful that the girls found themselves the objects of competition, which was something of a novel experience. This interesting result was brought about in a very simple way. Miss Winn invited eighty-five girls and one hundred and fifty men.

In the Social Spotlight

Miss Helen Comte and Miss Adele Chevalier entertained about thirty of their little friends at the Clay-street home of Mr. and Mrs. A. Comte Jr., on the afternoon of December 27. The feature of the occasion was a Christmas tree freighted with good things which a Santa Claus distributed much to the joy of the little folks. During the afternoon there was dancing, and a delicious repast was served.

Announcement is made of the marriage in San Jose on December 27, of Mr. Charles Hittell, the eldest son of Theodore Hittell, the historian, and Dr. Amy Bowen, the well-known physician. Both are very well known in this city. It was a quiet wedding and the news came as a pleasant surprise to their wide circle of friends.

Mrs. Carroll de Forrest Buck was a luncheon hostess at the Palace during the week, entertaining half a dozen friends.

Mary Mannering in "A Man's World"

By Edward F. O'Day

I believe it is the fashion of dramatic criticism to treat plays like "A Man's World" with the dully dullness which passes for profound seriousness. One is expected to delve into one's stores of predigested philosophy to show why the dramatist is or is not worthy of immortal fame, it being taken for granted, seemingly, that every play which comes along must be classified as the greatest ever or the worst possible. But I fail to see the necessity for ponderous thoughtfulness in connection with this play by Miss Rachel Crothers. Miss Crothers, I take it, is a woman of some experience in the making of plays. That she is also a woman of intense moral purpose I the like of whom I have never met among the varied assortment of impossible characters in real life. A man may be impossible and still be real, but Miss Crothers' man is too impossible. Of course, if the audience were allowed to know throughout the play that the leading man was impossible, the play would lack dramatic interest. So Miss Crothers, with less than average feminine ingenuity, conceals the fact from the audience until the last act and then springs it as an end-all of the play. The method is novel, but will be slow to win the approval of Miss Crothers' associates in the dramaturgic field. It is so apt to give audiences the idea that they are being fooled; and once an audience gets that notion it takes its revenge by refusing to be interested.

I do not know whether Miss Crothers built "A Man's World" for Miss Mary Mannering's peculiar needs. Certainly it fits her very well. Miss Mannering may always be depended on to give a workmanlike account of herself. She has beauty, which is a great deal; and talent, which is a great deal more or a great deal less according to the point of view. Perhaps it would be less bromidic to say that Miss Mannering has intelligence. It shows in all her acting. And she has a fund of good humor. There is a child in the play who is a study in precocity, a most unattractive study; yet Miss Mannering smiles through it all. Her endurance is actually heroic. A notice of the play which ignored Miss Helen Ormsbee would be incomplete. She plays the part of an anemic young woman with a half-hearted hankering for the "Bohemian" life and an almost fierce desire for happiness. It is the best conceived and the best executed character in the play and Miss Ormsbee plays it with perfect sympathy. Let us try to remember Miss Ormsbee and see whether her name does not recur soon in a bigger, if not a better, role.

"Billy" at the Alcazar

One of the funniest comedies ever written is "Billy" which is to be given its first presentation in San Francisco next Monday evening at the Alcazar, with Evelyn Vaughan and Bertram Lytell in the leading roles. It was constructed by Mr. and Mrs. Sydney Drew and produced by them in New York, where it scored a long and profitable run, after which it was put on tour. With much fun-yielding material to work on the Alcazar players can be depended upon to give an amusing performance. Mr. Lytell will be seen as Billy, Miss Vaughan as his sweetheart; and Miss Barriscale, Howard Hickman, Adele Belgarde, Burt Wesner, Thomas Chatterton, Louis Bennison, and Will R. Walling, with all the other regular members of the company, will have good parts. The three acts take place on the water and a very realistic stage picture is assured.

BONITA

the popular musical comedy prima donna who will appear this Sunday matinee at the Orpheum.

to gather from "A Man's World." It is an interesting play with no more moral significance than "The Merry Widow" or "The Two Orphans." It differs from most of the other plays in its class by having an unhappy ending. That unhappy ending was the happiest thought of the author. It is no doubt responsible for the serious talk about the play, for I have heard this play very seriously talked about, and I cannot imagine any other reason for devoting to "A Man's World" the serious consideration which one would not devote to, let us say, "The Dollar Princess." "A Man's World" is inaccurately described by its title. It shows a man's world, sure enough, but it is a man's world as a woman dramatist imagines it to be. Miss Crothers has many illusions about the world of men. She seems to think that the men for whom she insists on telling us the world was made are a set of emasculated Murderians, if I may be pardoned the word, and inufferable cads. The principal man of Miss Crothers' mimic world is an impossible character

"The Nigger" at the Savoy

Mary Mannering will make her last appearance at the Savoy in "A Man's World" this Saturday evening and on Sunday "The Nigger," Edward Sheldon's much discussed play dealing with the Southern race problem, will begin an engagement limited to eight nights. There are fourteen characters in "The Nigger" and every part in the play is said to be of vital importance in developing the story. The central character, played by that San Francisco favorite, Thurlow Bergen, is that of Philip Morrow, first the sheriff of his county and then the Governor of his State, whose career as a white man is blasted by the discovery that he has colored blood in his veins. The principal feminine role is in the hands of Miss Florence Roberts who will undoubtedly receive an ovation on her appearance Sunday evening. The company provided by William A. Brady is said to be exceptionally strong.

The Gerville-Reache Concerts

That wonderful artist, Mme. Gerville-Reache whose contralto voice is without question one of the most beautifully toned vocal organs of this generation, will give her second concert at Christian Science Hall this Sunday afternoon, January 8. The operatic gems on her program include "Les Stances" from Gounod's "Sapho," "Air de Lia" from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," "Stride la Vampa" from "Il Trovatore" and "L'Air du Tigre" from "Paul et Virginie" by Victor Masse. The "lieder" numbers will be "In der Fremde," Schumann; "Der Erlkonig," Schubert; "Addio," Pirelli; "Plaisir d'Amour," Martini; "Pensee d'Automne," Massenet; "Desolation," Max Guss, and English ballads by Allitsen, Harriet Ware and De Koven. The farewell concert of Gerville-Reache will be given next Tuesday night, January 10, with an entirely different program.

Another Week of "The Dollar Princess"

The management of the Columbia announces that Charles Frohman's great production of "The Dollar Princess" will continue as the attraction at that playhouse for a third and last week commencing with this Sunday night, January 8. Great audiences have attended the performances of the piece already given and the advance sale of seats for the remaining presentations is very big. "The Dollar Princess" will be seen for the last time on Saturday night, January 14. There will be matinees on Wednesday and Saturday. "The Traveling Salesman," James Forbes' comedy based on the life of "the man of the grip" will play a limited engagement at the Columbia commencing Monday night, January 16. The cast will be a particularly strong one.

Kocian, the Bohemian Violinist

Jarislav Kocian, the Bohemian violin virtuoso and one of the truly great masters of the instrument, will give his first concert at Christian Science Hall on Sunday afternoon, January 15. His program for this opening event will be a fine one and will introduce to our music lovers a new composition of great importance, a "Concerto" for violin by d'Ambrosio, one of the young Italians whose works are receiving considerable attention abroad. Two Bach works—an "Adagio" by Ries, "Zephyr" by Hubay, Paganini's difficult "I Palpiti" and a "Humoresque" by the young player—will be among the works to be given. Maurice Eisner, a young piano virtuoso, will offer several attractive numbers besides playing the accompaniments for Kocian. The second concert will be given Thursday night, January 19, and the farewell on Sunday afternoon, January 22.

Great Bill at the Orpheum

Alice Lloyd continues to be the theatrical sensation of the city. No greater favorite has ever appeared at the Orpheum and she is received at every performance with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of approval. For next week which will positively be her last, Miss Lloyd promises a new repertoire of songs. The entire program for the coming week will be particularly attractive. Among the new acts will be Joseph Hart's "Bathing Girls," a pretentious girl review. It is perhaps the most novel and diverting series of musical specialties the ingenious Mr. Hart has evolved. Bonita, one of the most popular and celebrated of musical comedy prima donnas who is playing a brief engagement in vaudeville, will appear in a condensed musical comedy, "The Real Girl." The Hanlon Brothers, erstwhile stars of extravaganza, will be included in the new bill. These famous brothers have invented more ingenious effects than any other Pierrots. Elise, Wulff and Waldoff, a trio of German acrobats and comedians who are quite a novelty in their line, will introduce many astounding feats and finale which will prove a great surprise; and Hibbert and Warren, two unique minstrels, will provide a pastime which they call "Colored, But Not Born That Way." "A Night in a Monk Music Hall" presented by Maud Rochez will return for next week only and it will be the last of the famous minstrel comedian, Lew Sully.

Ye Liberty Offers "Samson"

"Samson" will be the offering of the Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, for the week commencing next Monday evening. It will mark the initial presentation across the bay of this notable dramatic hit, and the success achieved in the play in New York by both William Gillette and James K. Hackett, as well as the latter's triumph in it at the Alcazar in this city, has made its appearance in Oakland on eagerly looked forward to by theatergoers. Manager Bishop promises a cast and production worthy of the play in every way. After one week of the French drama, "Billy," the comedy which entertained New Yorkers all last season at Daly's Theater will be given.

Should Be Run In

When charged with being drunk and disorderly and asked what he had to say for himself the prisoner gazed pensively at the magistrate smoothed down a remnant of gray hair, and said "Your honor, man's inhumanity to man make countless thousands mourn. I'm not as debased as Swift, as profligate as Byron, as dissipated as Poe, as debauched as ——" "That will do!" thundered the magistrate. "Ten days! And, officers, take a list of those names and run 'em in. They're as bad as he is!"

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—There was nothing in the past week that could be of any significance in the future course of values. In fact the trading in securities was purely the evening up of contracts. There seems very little to say other than what we have stated very recently on the security outlook. The strongest financial interests are in possession of the bulk of the floating supply of stocks and they will continue to hold them until a complete readjustment of the railway rate situation occurs. The steel and iron trade outlook is slow and puts a damper on any other good news that might affect the market bullishly and yet there is very little hope of a revival in this line. The western railroads have seen fit to grant their employees an advance in wages and this much talked of railroad strike has been averted. The Interstate Commerce Commission is expected to grant the railroads an increase in freight rates and this should in turn be reflected in the Steel and equipment companies as an announcement of an increase in freight rates would be followed by orders for steel and other equipments. The money situation is not expected to be a factor from now on as the banks are well supplied and time money can be had at very reasonable rates. The market, however, continues in the same old rut and trading is confined to room professionals.

Wheat—Trade in wheat the past week was quiet with a very limited trade and most of the business was done by Chicago professionals. The LaSalle Street house is said to be long in the neighborhood of twenty million bushels of the May option, and on any signs of weakness they immediately come to the support of the market reversing their operations on the slightest advances. The news generally has been in favor of the bears. Stocks of wheat keep piling up at a market centers and the demand from the mills is very slim. All the big Northwestern mills report trade extremely dull with only a small order now and then for export. Flour prices were cut again and some little business was done at the decline. The foreigner acts independent of us as the total stocks of wheat in Europe are much larger than last year and the movement to the continent shows no signs of picking up. Crop conditions in this country are more favorable and the Modern Miller, a weekly publication, says snow generally covers the winter wheat belt area and the crop is now in condition to withstand any cold weather. A good deal will depend upon the attitude of the big holder. He is strong enough financially to take care of his line and when the news changes as it will in time to the bull side, shorts will find the market bare of wheat and the market will be worked higher regardless of its merit.

Corn—As in wheat trade has also been light in corn until the last two days of the week when sentiment changed to the bull side due to the attitude of two of the largest houses in the trade openly taking the bull side of the market and buying a couple of million bushels of the May option. About this time a local statistician issued a report estimating the crop just harvested at 271,000,000 bushels less than the Government's figures. Congestion in the December option was an added help and prices were given a sharp upturn. Receipts of corn have been large and it is difficult to understand where all the corn is going to as it does not show up in the warehouses. Contract stocks are very small and one of the largest shorts in the December option was compelled to take advantage of the rule allowing of the delivery of No. 3 corn at a 5 cent penalty which showed him quite a loss. The market will be governed from now on by the movement from the farm and as long as the farmer shows a disposition to market his corn at prevailing prices there is very little chance of any extended upturn. However a disposition on the part of the farmer to hold his corn which might be influenced by a change to extreme cold weather would cause some anxiety in the ranks of the shorts and prices could easily be advanced as the price looks low and is attractive to the investor.

Cotton—Owing to the weight of heavy receipts the tendency of the market continues downward. All the trade the past week has been extremely light and the bull crowd had no trouble in halting prices whenever the market looked as if it might get away from them. Receipts the past week have been almost twice as large as the same week last year and are even larger than two years ago when the crop was over 13,500,000 bales. Even though the movement for the balance of the season be no larger than receipts after this time one year ago, the present movement is on a basis of a crop of 11,719,000 bales. On the basis of the last census report the indicated crop is 11,950,000 bales even though there be more cotton to gin during the remainder of the season than was ginned after this time last year, as more cotton had been ginned than last year up to the last ginning report of this year by 1,340,000 bales. It is only natural therefore to assume that the crop has been under-estimated, and unless receipts show a marked falling off in the near future, it is only a question of time when such conclusions will have been arrived at generally. If such possibilities should become a reality there would probably be a change in sentiment, perhaps of a world wide character, which might affect the market unfavorably to a great extent, as crop estimates would probably be increased. There are no signs of an immediate let up in the heavy movement to market, as receipts at and shipments from primary markets continue large. Official trade reports covering the textile situation in New England are very unfavorable, the demand, insufficient to absorb the restricted production, causing stocks to increase. The total stocks in New York are nearly 300,000 bales and are increasing which will be a check to any bull manipulation.

Express and other proponents of Los Angeles reform and the result was a meeting in May, 1907, in Levy's restaurant at which the Lincoln Republicans were organized. There was a meeting in Oakland in the following August at which both north and south were represented and the Lincoln-Roosevelt League emerged full armed and ready for fight, with Chester Rowell as its secretary and general organizer. It took a long time for the League to win, but Rowell kept pegging away and when the landslide took place last November the grateful reformers made Rowell their president, some of the more enthusiastic even mentioning him for United States senator.

This is not the first time he has been mentioned. In the flush of the campaign of two years ago, when the Leaguers thought that they were going to carry everything before him, there was a lot of talk of giving him Senator Perkins' toga. I suppose that sort of talk flattered Rowell, but he never showed it. He was indorsed one night at a district meeting in this city, but I distinctly remember that when it became necessary to move a piano into the hall (which was over an undertaker's shop), he took a hand in the work. And when the meeting was over he was too interested in a conversation about the origin of the Basque language to be interviewed about the senatorship.

The high brow will out in spite of politics. When Rowell gets tired writing political editorials for the guidance of Fresno, he recreates by tossing off a few hundred words on the differentiation of the umlaut from the ablaut or on the affinity of Moeso-Gothic and Old High Du which must be very interesting reading for raisin growers. Sometimes his editorials like like excerpts from a journal of philology and like to bet that even Mills Gayley doesn't understand them all.

No California reformer has been more knocked than Rowell, but he thrives on it. His paper one of the best properties in the state, his political faction is in the saddle and he enjoys best of health. If you could sit with him in editorial sanctum while he relieves his nervous tension by snipping wonderful paper pattern with the editorial shears and discusses any subject under the sun, high brow subjects preferred, you would like him. Of course you would always agree with him, even when he delves to philosophical origins to prove that Worcester ought to be the next United States senator.

"Suspected as much," he murmured; "it is pair of Carlists."

"Numerous?"

"I cannot distinguish them, but I judge by the number of their horses that there are more than twenty. Listen!"

"In the narrow defile, could be plainly heard the nervous step of the Spanish horse. The next instant the moon topped the crest of the mountains and lighted up the somber depths of the pass, flashing from fifty carbines. Suddenly, the figure in command stopped. My blood froze. He grasped my arm and whispered, 'Silence!' I listened; a voice came from the abyss: 'He is here,' cried the officer. 'He could hide nowhere, for there is no other shelter anywhere.' Nothing more was said. I crawled toward the door, followed by G—. At the same moment the Carlist officer reached the path. 'What is to be done?' I panted. 'Wait,' answered the guide. We had not to wait long.

The Carlist officer appeared on the platform and turned toward the hut, but recoiled on seeing it.

"Your life depends on your answer!" he exclaimed. "What are you doing here?"

The point of his sword was at our throats. The least resistance would be fatal to us and our not save the deserter.

"Captain," I said, "we are French travelers, lost in the mountains, and —"

"Give me your passports!"

"We have none."

"And you?" he asked the guide.

"We have none either," answered G—, shrugging his shoulders.

The Carlist officer turned to five of his men who had followed him.

"And these men," he ordered, going toward the door.

"Captain," I called after him, "you violate the rights of citizens!"

"He deigned no answer, but kicked the door open. What followed was frightful. Micaela, seeing that it was I, advanced to the entrance, but then she recognized the Carlist uniform she was transformed. Her soft eyes flashed like a storm, she sprang in front of Juan d'Estella, and cried:

"Back, bandit, wretch!" While I live you shall not lay a hand on my husband!"

For a moment the captain was subjugated by her wonderful beauty; but recovering himself, he snatched off his belt, and endeavored to bind the courageous woman, but he had not reckoned with Juan d'Estella. The latter sprang toward the officer, with uplifted arm; but ere the knife could fall, soldiers seized him from behind and stretched him on the floor. The silence of death followed the momentary confusion.

"Juan d'Estella," said the captain coldly, "you have deserted and you are going to die. And you, whoever you are who aided him, will soon follow."

"I range that the threat made no impression on me; my mind was so intent upon the fate of the deserter.

The moon was full and silvered the mountain side. Juan was led to the platform. Micaela ceased to be crazed with grief, and she, like ourselves, was reduced to impotence.

"Young man," said the Carlist officer, "I will give you one chance of escape. Go down that path, and we will shoot as if at a deer. If you reach the bottom alive, so much the better or you."

"Juan made no answer. During this time the detachment had scaled the mountain and they held their carbines ready to obey the command.

"Go," said the officer, "go quickly."

"Juan turned and murmured:

"Permit me to embrace my wife."

"Go, I order you," repeated the captain, pushing him toward the abyss.

"The deserter made the sign of the cross, sent a last kiss to his wife, and stepped down the rocks.

"Scarcely had he gone down a few meters when twenty shots whistled around him, and his hat fell, riddled with bullets, while he still continued to hurry down.

"Luckless fellows!" shouted the officer. "He will escape."

"Snatching his carbine, he took deliberate aim and fired. The body of the unfortunate d'Estella, bounding from rock to rock, was dashed to the bottom, his blood splashing the stones.

"We witnessed the horrible scene, death in our souls, when suddenly a pistol shot rang out behind us.

"Micaela, forgotten for an instant by her guards, held the still smoking revolver in one hand, while the other pointed to the Carlist officer, brained and stretched on the platform. A roar of anger burst from the soldiers as they rushed toward her. It was too late. Giving one harsh cry of mad laughter, she placed the pistol to her temple and pulled the trigger.

"The horror was more than I could bear and I fainted.

"When I became conscious, I was stretched on the straw of a prison floor.

"Where am I?" I asked of a jailer who entered.

"In the Carlist camp," he answered and went out.

"During the day, the guide and I appeared before the general, who was a good man. On learning my name and position, he sent us with an escort over the frontier.

"From that day, I never hear of the Carlist war, that I do not see the beautiful woman's face before me, and the body of the unfortunate deserter dashing down into the abyss, with the splendor of the moon illuminating the most horrible scene upon which human eyes could look."

FAT FOLKS FAVOR

Home Mixture That Takes Off the Fat Rapidly—Causes No Wrinkles—No Stomach Ills and Requires Neither Dieting Nor Exercise

Too much fat is both uncomfortable and dangerous, but usually fleshy people prefer to put up with its inconvenience rather than punish themselves with the tiresome exercising usually prescribed, or endanger their health by taking the so-called "cures" and patent fat "reducers."

This self-sacrifice of comfort and health to overabundant fat is entirely unnecessary, however, as Mrs. Luella Bigger tells us there is a home receipt that is far superior in every way to anything money will buy for reducing superfluous flesh. It is said this simple mixture will take the fat off of man or woman at the rate of at least a couple of pounds a week without even causing wrinkles. Moreover it does not disturb the stomach, but is a good thing for the system, clearing away pimples, and, best of all, it does not interfere with the diet. You can use it and at the same time eat whatever you like. This receipt is as follows:—½ ounce Marmola; ½ ounce Fluid Extract Cascara Aromatic and 3¼ ounces of Peppermint Water. Get these ingredients at any drug store, mix them together at home and take one teaspoonful after each meal and at bedtime.

Mrs. Bigger, as is well known, is a famous beauty expert, and whatever she recommends is sure to be found eminently satisfactory.

A total of 28,000 miles service without a puncture is the record reported for a Diamond tire on a Locomobile demonstrator by a Chicago garage. This Diamond was constantly in use winter and summer for over three years without being off the rim. In five years the above mentioned Locomobile covered 58,000 miles with but one change of Diamond tire.

Auto Notes

A. Elliott Ranney who sells motor cars in New York City visited the new factory of the Hudson Company at Detroit the other day, and during a visit with Vice-president E. H. Broadwell, told of a remarkable run made by Dr. L. T. Smith of New York from the metropolis to Bretton Woods. The distance of 408 miles was traversed absolutely without a stop. The time taken for the trip was exactly seventeen hours. No attempt was made to hurry, the doctor merely wishing to make a non-stop record. He could have beaten the average of twenty-five miles an hour very easily, if he had tried.

Although for the most part the various 1911 models have already arrived on the local market, there are yet a few types to make their first appearance here. Among those which local motoring circles are awaiting with interest is the Haynes fore-door type which includes a five passenger touring car, a roadster, a suburban and a seven passenger car. The 1911 Haynes model open front touring car has been here for some weeks and both in finish of body and mechanism promises much for the types that are to follow.

"The highest grade and quality of motor car possible to produce, and regardless of expense" is still the slogan of the Lozier Company. In concentrating the efforts of two automobiles factories on the production of two models—a four cylinder and six cylinder—identically alike in all details with the exception of the motor, the Lozier Company is achieving its purpose of producing a high-powered, durable and luxurious touring car that will give the tourist the greatest amount of comfort and satisfaction in any country or over any roads in the world.

According to Eastern reports E. P. Brinegar did some effective work for San Francisco as the place for holding the Panama-Pacific Fair during his stay in Detroit. A leading Detroit daily is quoted as follows: "The Panama Canal Exposition is the biggest thing they talk about in California these days. E. P. Brinegar, one of the most prominent business men on the coast and president of the Pioneer Automobile Company, has been in the city the past week attending the convention of Chalmers dealers. Incidentally Mr. Brinegar has been doing some work among the automobile manufacturers in an effort to get their support for California as the scene of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition in 1915."

Mohler & DeGress are probably the first automobile dealers in the world to sell and deliver a car in a territory where a war was in progress. Perhaps the revolution in Mexico did not attain the dignity of a war but it was at least pretty serious to the people of Puebla, where the revolutionary uprisings were most severe. When the uprising was at its worst and while fighting was actually going on in the streets Mohler & DeGress sold a Chalmers "30" Touring Car to one of the principal business men of Puebla.

Jack Wright of Berkeley claims the long distance tire mileage record of California, basing his contention on the service given him by a Diamond that equips his National Car. Speaking of this he said, "I think I have the longest long distance mileage record in the State. My car was delivered to me August 31, 1907, equipped with Diamond Tires. The left front tire is still on and has never had a puncture or been off the wheel, and has a mileage of over 17,000 miles. During the three years that this tire has been in service it has rolled over all kinds of roads."

According to a telegram just received by the Motor Sales Company of California from F. P. Steele, general sales manager of the Inter-State Automobile Company who is visiting Los Angeles, the first touring car sold at the Los Angeles Automobile Show was an Inter-State.

Nellie Artigues, as the Administratrix of the Estate of Charles A. Artigues, also known as Charles Artigues, deceased, having this day filed herein her verified Petition for an Order of Sale of the whole of the real estate of said decedent for the purposes therein set forth;

And it appearing therefrom that it is necessary to the whole of said real estate for the purpose of paying debts outstanding against said decedent, the family allowance that will become due at the end of one year from the time of said decedent's death, and the debts, expenses and charges of the administration of said decedent's estate ready accrued and that will hereafter accrue;

It is ordered, that all persons interested in the estate of said decedent appear before this Court on Tuesday, January 17, 1911, at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the Courtroom of Department No. 10, the building known as and called the Grant Building, the Easterly corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and there to show cause, if any they have, why an Order should not be granted to said Administratrix for the sale of the whole of the real estate of said decedent;

God Boys' Book

Francis Rolt Wheeler's "Boy with the United States Foresters" is one of the comparatively few novels that can be heartily recommended. While it should appeal to any lad who likes a good, adventurous recital, it is especially suitable for those of fourteen or older who should be taking seriously of the work they are to follow throughout their lives, and to one who suits the occupation and is suited by it the department of forestry offers an excellent opening. The boy in this instance, Wilbur Loyle, had a liking for outdoors and possibly he had some inherited aptitude for his uncle was a noted geologist. Wilbur's own fancy was for the forests and he had a grand enthusiasm to carry him past the dead woods. The story should appeal to young Californians since Loyle's first appointment as a forest guard located him in the King's River Canyon, one of the government reservations of our own State. Though his work combined some of the features of both picnicking and camping out it was by no means a long summer holiday. Almost at the outset, in such a simple and apparently personal matter as the choice of riding poles he found that he had to discard his preferences and consider the nature of his duties for his immediate overseer, "Old Rifle Eye," though by no means capricious and fault-finding, soon gave him to understand that he had entered upon a career of eternal vigilance. Neither excuses nor apologies were wanted but only the most perfect work he was capable of giving. He had his appointed round to patrol, his specified posts to visit at regular intervals and his reports to be made promptly. He must rise early and be ready to forego sleep when duty calls, and to be always ready to essay the impossible. But the right sort of stuff, Loyle took hold with a will and every day he learned some new secret of woodcraft, some simple fact upon which safety might hang. One of his least pleasant duties was the overhauling of tourists and travelers who were likely to be careless about fires, selfish about piurage, and worse than all else, too bumptiously opinionated to give heed to warnings. Timber thieves were to be hunted down and their malicious mischief circumvented, and every hour of the twenty-four and every day of the seven held possibilities of adventure. The "Boy with the United States Foresters" had no time for irresponsible foolery. He risked his neck for bigger interests than football scores and frat escapades. It is a decided step in advance to find boys' books at last taking cognizance of some other phase of life than irresponsible defiance of laws and conventions. From Lothrop, Lee and Shepard.

Paul Elder Books

"The Book of Hospitalities," with its blank pages for guest records will probably be enlarged twice its size by the time the next edition is called for, for the custom of keeping such accounts grows apace, and the necessity for abundance of space will be self-evident. The preword, supplied by Arthur Guiterman, is a most interesting account of house mottoes such as men of other days, who built their habitations to endure for generations, were fond of placing over doorways and in halls, a custom which survives at least in spirit, in the burnt-wood wall decorations of flats and apartments and even the cardboard and crewel atrocities of the tenements. In addition to the house mottoes, many of them both ancient and classical, which Mr. Guiterman has brought together, he has added other sentiments appropriate to every article likely to be made use of by a guest so that those in search of brief presentation speeches as well as of mottoes will find herein a mine of wealth after its kind. The volume is brought out in a style which reflects credit on its sponsors.

Something appropriate, unique and inexpensive in the way of a gift card is "Ebisu," the Japanese god of luck and patron of honest labor. The card is put together in screen form, three leaves, the center one containing two reproductions of the luck god placed back to back, so that the droll rear view first presents itself, and following the advice to "turn for luck," the smiling countenance and good wishes come into view. The interpretative verses and rhymes are the work of W. O. McGeehan, so well known in the local newspaper world, and the card, though especially timely for the holidays, would be equally acceptable on any gift-making occasion. It is a product of the Tomoye Press.

The Paul Elder Co.'s "Envelope Booklets" decidedly fill a long-felt want, for there are often occasions when one would be glad to send some slight remembrance to a friend were it not that everything which presents itself as at all desirable for a possession is in some way inappropriate. One wants something between a card and a full fledged book, something that can be sent through the mails without doubling its cost in postage and yet something which is not hall-marked with the signs of penny-scraping. These little booklets, beautiful and artistic enough to please the eye, yet with meat enough in their pages to feed the mind, done up in envelopes to match their covers, cost but 35 cents, with three cents additional for postage. There is a considerable selection to choose from, one of the additions for this year being "Love and Friendship," a selection of aphorisms and epigrams by Lillyan Shafner.

"Slumber Sea Chanteys" belongs to mother and the baby, and incidentally all the other grown folks and little folks of the household. They are not precisely nursery rhymes nor are they of the usual order of slumber songs, but have grown for themselves out of the world-old custom of crooning the baby to sleep. The words are by Lucia Chase Bell and Rita Bell James, and the accompaniment by Carrie Stone Freeman. Illustrations, by Rita Bell James, of babies in various attitudes and occupations, interspersed as head and tail pieces and decorations, are exceptionally good. "Slumber Sea Chanteys" might very appropriately be the first contribution to a child's musical library.

The Weather and the Farmer

How singular is the solicitude of the city dweller for the tiller of the soil! There are men in this the City of Serene Day and Tranquil Night who though basking in summer rays for a whole month in midwinter instead of extracting a sentiment of piety from the kindness of Nature did nothing but speak disrespectfully of the weather. These men have the farmer on their nerves. No kind of weather pleases them because in a State that yields everything that is grown under the sun there is never a good wind that doesn't blow ill to somebody. The farmer in his infinite variety is born to bad weather as the sparks fly upward. But solicitude for the farmer is really a waste of emotion as anybody may learn by consulting the latest report of Secretary Wilson, the guide, philosopher and friend of all agriculturists. The farmer has been waxing rich through a long series of years, and never did he have a more prosperous year than the one that has just passed. As to our California farmers, those that are not in irrigation districts may have reason at times to complain of the weather, but their troubles are light compared with those that beset the average urban mortal who has insistent personal relations with the problem of the high cost of living. Most of our California farmers are "gentlemen farmers" who ride in automobiles and loll about the lobbies of our first-class hotels, talking politics and discussing ways and means of improving the morals of city dwellers. They have entirely abandoned the worship of Ceres; preoccupied with the affairs of government gratitude for the fertility of the soil impels them never to the Eleusinian temple. So let us not bother ourselves about the farmer; and when a long stretch of blithe weather comes along in midwinter let us enjoy it to the full. If we have compassion to dispense let it be for the flowers that yearn for the kisses of the rain and for the premature exuberant sparrows who while intoxicated some weeks ago with the wine of winter suns heralded earth's divine renewal and then drooped with the melancholy of disappointment.

Our Progressive Governor

When Governor Johnson delivered his inaugural message last week the Octopus broke out with gooseflesh and plutophobia barked exultingly. The message has evoked a curious diversity of criticism. In some quarters it is regarded as astonishing that a lawyer should have so little respect for his profession, so little reverence for its traditions, as to recommend that judges be subjected to the Recall. By some critics the Governor's sentiments are regarded as socialistic, others pronounce them populist and others characterize them as both demagogic and anarchistic. All of which argues a misconception of principles and a misunderstanding of the role which the author of the message is playing. A lawyer in private life, as Governor of the State of California Mr. Johnson is above all things a public servant and patriot animated by a great heart of fire that burns with sympathy with the dear people. His election to office was the result of the application of the principle of the direct primary, a principle that recognizes not only the right of the people to act but also the wisdom necessary for any kind of action, whether it be to adjust our relations with foreign countries, or to improve our system of education, or to administer justice according to the fundamentals of the science of law. Mr. Johnson has merely advocated the extension of this principle to one of the branches of the government the absolute independence of which has been hitherto regarded by hidebound conservatives as essential to the stability of our institutions and the preservation of our liberties. The message, therefore, in our opinion, marks a very notable advance in the great progressive movement that has been gathering impetus in the cultured States of the Middle and Far West. Realizing the logical trend of that movement Governor Johnson has anticipated his contemporaries. He has out-Folletted "Battle Bob," and though he modestly styles himself a follower of the Wisconsin champion of the people, it would not astonish us if he should immediately win recognition as the logical leader of his party. In one of the comedies of Aristophanes, a very entertaining satire on demagogism, where there is lively competition for the affections of the masses, the character most prodigal of promises carries the day. By the same token Governor Johnson may supplant the Cleon of Wisconsin. For thus far "Battle Bob" has not conceived anything so flattering to the people as the creation of a popular tribunal vested with the powers and functions of a court of last resort. "Battle Bob" is progressive enough to favor putting the legislative branch of the government in the hands of the mob so that there shall be no check on their impulses, no protection for the haughty and undeserving business interests, but so far as the department of justice is concerned he lags miles behind California's most distinguished patron of Demos. "Battle Bob" has gone no further, so far as we know, than to recommend the appointment of progressive judges. We suspect "Battle Bob" of lacking the courage of his progressive principles. He is in favor of a simple democracy, one so simple that it has never been tried in any country where there were more than twenty thousand voters, but if the thought ever occurred to him of making judges the puppets of the masses to administer justice by counting noses he has never given it audible utterance. So obviously Governor Johnson is more progressive than Senator La Follett and in the circumstances it is too bad that his activities should be confined to the State of California where his light is hid under bushel. The most progressive of Progressives ought to be in the Senate of his country casting the white effulgent beams of his great intellect over all the nation, making "Battle Bob" look like a farthing rushlight.

A Mixture of Anarchy and Democracy

Governor Johnson's message, though masterpiece of its kind, is not absolutely flawless. One objection to it is that it does not go to the limit of democratic simplicity. Governor Johnson's scheme for administering justice is cumbersome. Instead of the Recall for judges what he should have recommended is the Referendum for the solution of all intricate problems of law. Why go through the expensive formality of holding an election to ascertain whether a judge has squared the law of a case with public opinion when there is the more simple and democratic process of impaneling a jury of all the people and submitting each case to the argument of the leading demagogues of the moment? Another objection to the message is that it does not adhere strictly to the great principle of the progressive movement. Though affecting a profound faith in the intelligence of the masses and affirming his confidence in their ability to resolve questions of law, yet Governor Johnson is quite sure they are not capable of exercising wise discrimination in selecting men for office. So he is in favor of a shorter ballot and of having himself empowered to appoint the Secretary of State, the Treasurer, the Attorney-General and the Superintendent of Public Instruction. The people in his opinion cannot be trusted to put the right men into those offices, so the Governor asks the people to trust him to make wise selections and at the same to abstain from taking advantage of the enormous political power which would come to him through his control of all the important departments of State. This may be sound policy but it is not democratic. It implies at once a lack of confidence in the people and a disposition to build up a powerful political machine with which to perpetuate men in office. It is unfortunate that so good a man as Governor Johnson should seem to incur so invidious an imputation.

The Socialistic View

To characterize Governor Johnson's message as socialistic and find fault with it for that reason is absurd. What there is of a socialistic nature in the message is good. Governor Johnson could go much further along socialistic lines without meriting the disapproval of those who are concerned for the welfare of mankind. But the truth as to Socialists is that they will find very little to approve and much to censure in the gubernatorial message. For the purpose of achieving a more equal distribution of wealth Socialists are in favor of reforming the principles and methods of government gradually and scientifically, but they are not in favor of encouraging the sordid interests and meanest passions of the "herd confused and miscellaneous rabble!" Their maxim is that nothing is politically right which is morally wrong, and they know that it would be morally wrong to make justice a matter of popular caprice. The average Socialist is better informed about the science of government than the average merchant or the average debtor or the average broker or even the average California editor. For the average Socialist is a student of the science of government. He is aware that of this science as of other sciences there are certain First Principles, and he knows that paramount among them is the principle of justice. He knows that numbers make law but that justice has nothing to do with figures. Knowing that law is no less a science than astronomy, he would think it as outrageous to dismiss a judge from the public service for not deciding a case according to the whim of the moment as it was to imprison Galileo for holding fast to the great truths that he had discovered. The probability is that Governor Johnson's revolutionary suggestion regarding judges has filled the Socialists of this State with disgust. Concerned as they are for the amelioration of the condition of mankind and the increase of human happiness nothing can be more abhorrent to them than the idea of persuading the people to dynamite the temple of justice. Of course the Socialists of whom we speak are not those that believe we cannot be purged except in the fires of anarchy. We realize that sensible anarchists will applaud Governor Johnson's message.

The Delightful Billboard

The cant about billboard advertising has again broken out in the press. In Los Angeles the newspapers have started a crusade against billboards, the pretext being that they are a nuisance against which the esthetic sense revolts; and the Call of this city warmly applauds and tells us that "billboards make life hideous in modern towns." This is sublimated cant. The real objection to the business of fence advertising is that it hurts the newspaper business, and it is unfortunate that the newspapers are not in a position to object on that ground. If our newspapers were sincerely devoted to the public interests; if they were wedded to nothing but their function of instructing their readers, they would have a legitimate claim on the indulgence and protection of the State. As it is, they can have recourse to nothing but cant, thus giving further proof of their unworthiness by feigning a sentiment they do not feel. If the newspapers were really fastidious, if they were really prejudiced against things that are offensive to taste, things that are ugly, coarse and vulgar, they would look to themselves and improve their own appearance before insisting on the cultivation of beauty in others.

And as a matter of fact billboards do not make life hideous; not at any rate when they are good specimens of the lithographer's art. Such specimens are colorful and entertaining, they give animation to dead walls, they relieve the monotonous tedium of travel on street cars, they fill the blank spaces in the commuter's mind, mitigating the misery of existence in some slow suburban village. It would be better for all of us if we had more billboards to read and fewer newspapers. Fence advertising has many virtues and few vices. Unlike the press it never irritates or inflames. From the pictorial standpoint it is far superior to the press. As a stimulant to the imagination it is more wholesome. One scene from a new drama enables one to construct a whole plot. A row of heads familiarizing us with the features of a chewing gum magnate plunges us into the proper study of mankind and induces speculation of a most agreeable variety. There is much of symbolism and poetry in billboard advertising and a prodigious lot of clean fiction with a purpose. And that it is a kind of advertising that pays we have no doubt, for the newspapers avail themselves of it, and they ought to know. If you watch the billboards you will find that almost every daily has the largest circulation. The faith of the dailies in billboard advertising is the very finest tribute to its worth. In acting on this faith they make it hard for the average man to understand their hostility to the bill sticker's business.

To the Unattainable

Dear, how many the songs I bring to you
Woven of dream-stuffs, pleasure, and pain,
All the songs of my life I sing to you,
And you hear and answer again.
Though no rhyme do your dear lips say to me,
Yet, my poet, sweet songs you bring;
When you smile, then the angels play to me
Tunes to the silent songs you sing.

All my soul goes forth in a song to you,
All my deeds for your sake are done,
All my laurels and bays belong to you,
In your name are my battles won.
Just by living you make my life dear to me,
Though your lips never speak my name;
'Tis your hands that in dreams appear to me,
Bringing me all that I ask of fame.

Perspective Impressions

The current dispensation at Sacramento will go down in history as the "bad works" legislature.

The tendency of the moment in State affairs is to confound precarious progress with lasting results.

Johnson feels neither man is big enough.—Examiner headline. To the man of giant intellect ordinary mortals look like pygmies.

Governor Hadley, the reform leader of Missouri, confesses that the direct primary in that state is a failure. Let him be anathema.

The keynote of the messages of Governor Dixon and Governor Harmon was economy. But of course they're not progressive and don't care anything about up-to-date democracy. What do the people care about economy?

An Oregon squaw has applied for her ninth divorce. Isn't she entitled to admission to the Newport Set on the record of her past performances?

It has been discovered that the proportion of unmarried women in this country is growing larger every year. No wonder woman's suffrage is growing more popular.

At this writing the indications are that California is soon to be the most governed State in the Union. But of course a great deal depends on the patience of the dear people.

If the philosophy of our reformers is sound a moral obligation is something light as thistle down, as evanescent as a soap bubble, as binding as a rope of sand. As a principle of reform ethics it may be described as works without faith.

The man who would bring all men down to his own level is never concerned about bringing those below him up to himself.

The San Jose Times solemnly asks: "Who are the people?" The answer is, "The wise guys who put water on the politicians' wheel."

At the recent Bohemian jinks it might have been well to banish the owl and the "Weaving spiders" motto and substitute a Salisbury blue garter embroidered with the "Honi soit" shibboleth.

Once upon a time said Sir Robert Peel: "In every village there will arise some miscreant to establish the most grinding tyranny by calling himself the people." Yet Sir Robert never met an American editor, never heard of the Recall or the Referendum. But he had not read his history in vain.

Reby Transactions in Dilbat

German archaeologists are industriously excavating between the Tigris and the Euphrates in the neighborhood of Babylon where they have laid bare the foundations of the oldest temple yet discovered, built by Samsi Abad 1,800 years before Christ and rebuilt on the same plan 500 years later by Salmaneser I. after it had been burned down. At Tell el Amarna and Abusir and other places the industrious Teutons have labored and from all of these have gathered a rich harvest of inscriptions, works of art and other archaeological finds. Important though these may be historically, they are not as interesting as the surreptitious booty which the natives have been pilfering from mounds that the archaeologists have let alone so far, of which an account is given in the London Standard. Many tablets, inscribed with private matters, have been coming in, which all refer to a place called Dilbat. Where it is is not known precisely, for the Arabs naturally refuse to betray the hiding place of their hoard, but it is somewhere near Babylon, for the records speak of it as the grain port of that city and situate it on the great Arahtu irrigating canal. The tablets nearly all refer to dealings in real estate and were executed in duplicate. One copy was inscribed, baked hard and then copied; it was covered with soft clay on which the copy was written. In case of dispute the covering was broken and its inscription compared with that of the other one. The procedure is spoken of in the tablet of a deed. Most of the outer tablets, however, have been destroyed by the modern fellows who discovered them in the process of digging them out. The documents relate to the sale or renting of houses and lands or to the purchase and hiring of cattle and crops. The boundaries are clearly defined by the enumeration of adjoining property, with the names of the owners, and frequently by streets, canals, ponds or the harbor. This is followed by the statement of the value of the plot, the names of the vendors and purchasers, the oath sworn before the god of the city and the invocation of the reigning king.

High Toned Newspaper Controversy

The respect that is shown for the amenities of controversy by our polite and enlightened press is well illustrated by the dispute between the Call and the Fresno Republican resulting from a senatorial contest. "Honest Man Rowell quarrels Pitifully with Common Honesty" said the Call one day. Thereupon Mr. Chester Rowell, the high-brow editor of the Republican reported that the Call was impervious to logic because it was run by Mr. John D. Spreckels. When it is run by the San Francisco men who own it, it is well run," said Mr. Rowell. "When it is run by the San Diego man who owns it, it is run very badly and foolishly run. Just now John D. is on the job with both feet, and the style of the Call shows too plainly his chiropody." The truth is that Mr. Spreckels is on the briny and that he hasn't seen the Call office or been in touch with it for months. But of course "Honest Man Rowell" did not know that such was the case. He went on in answer to the Call's argument, refuting it with this irrefragable logic: "Opportunity knocks once at every man's door. It has knocked more than once at the Call's. When the graft prosecutions in San Francisco gave opportunity for a newspaper to be great by being right, the Call rose brilliantly to the opportunity—and John D. Spreckels of San Diego called it down, stupidly imposing on his own property the loss of the prestige which more intelligent men, against his will, had given it. A wonderfully brilliant editorial, announcing a stand-up policy, at the beginning of the last municipal campaign, was followed by a pitifully lie-down policy throughout that campaign. By the time Mayor McCarthy was elected, assisted in no small part by the Call's conscious misrepresentation of the Crocker-Leland situation, all the moral prestige the Call had struggled so hard to gain was lost irrevocably. John D. Spreckels of San Diego imposed that calamity, political and journalistic, on San Francisco. The Call, under inspiration from Minnesota, splendidly conducted the campaign for a direct primary, and then, under orders from San Diego, turned the final step of that campaign over to a traitorous Senator from San Diego, who allowed the emasculation of its Senatorial clause to the immoral mess of which another San Diego discovery is now sought to be made immorally the beneficiary. The Call, having thus helped the people of California to a direct primary, undertook to fool them into making that primary ridiculous, and defeating the Republican party, by advocating the candidacy of the personally financed protege of its San Diego owner."

A Marat Prescription

Whether Marat of the Terror was a veterinary surgeon or a fashionable physician is a point which historians have earnestly debated. Some light is thrown upon it by the memoirs, just published, of the Papal Envoy of the period, who was one of his patients, and reports as follows:

"He prescribed for me some medicine which would have killed me if the celebrated chemist of the Rue Jacob had been willing to give it to me. 'I see well enough,' he said, 'this is no medicine for you; it is medicine for a horse. I recognize the doctor's signature; he is mad.' Apparently Marat had mistaken me for one of his patients at the stable at which he was a physician."

A Practical Editor's Suggestion

The Editor of the San Jose Times has been pointing to our distinguished City Attorney, the Hon. Percy V. Long as an invidious example. Thus does he cruelly swat him:

"The city attorney of San Francisco is before the legislature with a scheme to acquire Spring Valley's properties under the law of eminent domain. He wants, too, to take the street railways of that city. The Los Angeles delegation intends to apply the law of eminent domain, if it can, to power plants and gas companies. It would be an excellent idea if lectures on eminent domain could be given in the public schools, but as the pupils have enough to do now, perhaps the occasion would be answered if applicants for a license to practice law were invited to read something about the subject. It would save the taxpayers some money to begin with and a great deal more in the end. As that has not been done, here is a suggestion: Call a convention and adopt every possible reform or confiscation, benefit or injury, that the uttermost theorist or practical politician can think of. Then, since we are going to have the referendum, submit them in a bunch to the people.

When the masses shall have passed upon them, cut the pay of any legislator who ever mentions one of the subjects again. This trick of pretentious and impossible proposals has been played so often at the legislature that it deceives no one. While a great howl is going up for this or that measure, the smooth reformer who is at the bottom of the scheme usually manages to pass a bill that has a bug in it."

The Times would put the quietus on our foremost citizens and ruthlessly diminish our joy of living.

We Have "Arrived"

There is no better proof of the extremely elevated position that opera holds in America at the present time than that the latest works of two of the most prominent living composers, Puccini and Humperdinck, have been recently produced in America for the first time on any stage, and that the work of a third—Mascagni—is shortly to be produced in this country for the first time. Ten years ago any one of these events would have been considered impossible. Now three of them take place within several weeks, and the eyes of all musical Europe are turned toward us. It is indeed a great satisfaction for us to know that despite the long trips across the ocean in winter the composers come to supervise personally the production of their operas. Richard Wagner created in Bayreuth the style which had to be recognized as standard by everybody, because it was the master composer himself who fixed every detail for the performances of his works and thus made them an almost perfect expression of his ideas. And now it is on American soil that the famous composers of three new operas, the success of which is anticipated by all Europe with the greatest interest, are likewise creating the standard style of production for their works, stamping it as the only authentic and correct one by the weight of their authority. While up to the present time the pilgrimage of American managers to Europe has been the rule, the time is coming, and pretty fast indeed, when the directors and stage managers of European opera houses will come to this side of the Atlantic to obtain their inspiration for the production of new operas.

Higginson's Dream

By R. B. Cunninghame Graham

The world went very well with Higginson; and about that time—say fifteen years ago—he found himself, his fortune made, settled down in Noumea. The group of islands which he had, as he said, rescued from barbarism, and in which he had opened the mines, made all the harbours, and laid out all the roads, looked to him as their Providence; and to crown the work, he had had them placed under the French flag. Rich, much respected, and with no worlds to conquer in particular, he still kept adding wealth to wealth; trading and doing what he considered useful work for all mankind in general, as if he had been poor.

Strange that a kindly man, a cosmopolitan, half French, half English, brought up in Australia, capable, active, pushing, and even not devoid of that interior grace a speculative intellect, which usually militates against a man in the battle of his life, should think that roads, mines, harbours, havens, ships, bills of lading, telegraphs, tramways, a European flag, even the French flag itself, could compensate his islanders for loss of liberty. Stranger in his case than in the case of those who go grown up with all the prejudices, limitations, circumscriptions and formalities of civilization become chronic in them, and see in savage countries and wild peoples but dumping ground for European trash, and capabilities for the extension of the Roubaix or the Sheffield trade; for he had passed his youth amongst the islands, loved their women, gone spearing fish with their young men, had planted taro with them, drunk kava, learned their language, and become as expert as themselves in all their futile arts and exercises; knew their customs and was as one of them, living their life and thinking it the best.

'Tis said (Viera, I think, relates it) that in the last years of fighting for the possession of Teneriffe, and when Alonso de Lugo was hard pressed to hold his own against the last Mencey, Bencomo, a strange sickness known as the "modorro" seized the Guanches and killed more of them than were slain in all the fights. The whole land was covered with the dead, and once Alonso de Lugo met a woman sitting on a hill-side, who called out, "Where are you going, Christian? Why do you hesitate to take the land? the Guanches are all dead." The Spanish chroniclers say that the sickness came about by reason of a wet season, and that, coming as it did upon men weakened by privation, they fell into apathy and welcomed death as a deliverer. That may be so, and it is true that in hill-caves even to-day in the lone valleys by Icod el Alto their bodies still are found seated and with the head bowed on the arms, as if having sat down to mourn the afflictions of their race, God had been merciful for once and let them sleep. The chroniclers may have been right, and the wet season, with despair, starvation and the hardships they endured, may have brought on the mysterious "modorro," the drowsy sickness, under which they fell. But it needs nothing but the presence of that conquering white man, decked in his shoddy clothes, armed with his gas-pipe gun, his Bible in his hand, schemes of benevolence deep rooted in his heart, his merchandise (that is, his whisky, gin and cotton cloths) securely stored in his corrugated iron-roofed sheds, and he himself active and persevering as a beaver or a red ant, to bring about a sickness which, like the "modorro," exterminates the people whom he came to benefit, to bless, to rescue from their savagery, and to make them wise, just, beautiful, and as apt to differentiate evil from good as even he himself. So it would seem, act as we like, our presence is a curse to all those people who have preserved the primeval instincts of our race. Curious, and yet apparently inevitable, that our customs seemed designed to carry death to all the so-called inferior races, whom at a bound we force to bridge a period which it has taken us a thousand years to pass.

In his prosperity, and even we may suppose during the Elysium of dining with sous-prefets in Noumea, and on the occasions when in Melbourne or in Sydney he once again consorted with Europeans, he always dreamed of a certain bay upon the coast far from Noumea, where in his youth he had spent six happy months with a small tribe, fishing and swimming, hunting, spearing fish, living on taro and bananas, and having for a friend one Tean, son of a chief, a youth of his own age. The vision of the happy life came back to him; the dazzling beach, the heavy foliage of the palao and bread-fruit trees; the grove of cocoa-nuts, and the zigzag and intricate paths leading from hut to hut, which when a boy he traversed daily, knowing them all by instinct in the same way that horses in wild countries know how to return towards the place where they were born. And still the vision haunted him; not making him unhappy, for he was one of those who find relief from thought in work, but always there in the same way that the remembrance of a mean action is ever present, even when one has made atonement, or induced oneself to think it was really mean, but rendered necessary by circumstances; or, in fact, when we imagine we have put to sleep that inward grasshopper which in our bosoms, blood, brain, stomach, or wheresoever it is situated, is louder or more faint according to our state of health, digestion, weakness, or what it is that makes us hear its chirp.

And so it was that cheap champagne seemed flat to him; the company of the yellow-haired and faded demi-mondaines whom Paris dumps upon New Caledonia insipid; the villas on the cliff outside Noumea vulgar; and the prosperity and progress of the place to which he had so much contributed, profitless and stale. Not that for a single instant he stopped working, planning and improving his estates, or missed a chance to acquire "town lots," or if a profitable 10,000 acres of good land with river frontage came into the market, hesitated for a moment to step in and buy. Now, though by this time he had long got past the need of actually trading with the natives at first hand, and kept, as rich men do, captains and secretaries and lawyers to do his lying for him, and only now and then would condescend to exercise himself in that respect when the stake was large enough to make the matter reputable, yet sometimes he would take a cruise in one of his own schooners and play at being poor. Nothing so tickles a man's vanity as to look back upon his semi-incredible past, and talk of the times when he had to live on sixpence a day, and to recount his breakfast on a penny roll and glass of milk, and then to put his hands upon his turtle-bloated stomach, smile a fat smile and say, "Ah, those were the days, then I was happy!" although he knows that at that halycon period he was miserable, not perhaps so much from poverty, as from that envy which is as great a curse to poor men as is indigestion to the rich.

So running down the coast of New Caledonia in a schooner, trading in pearls and copra, he came one evening to a well-remembered bay. All seemed familiar to him, the low white beach, tall palm-trees, coral reef with breakers thundering over it, and the still blue lagoon inside the clump of bread-fruit trees, the single tall grey stone just by the beach all graven over with strange characters, all struck a chord long dormant in his mind. Telling his skipper to let go his anchor, he rowed himself ashore. On landing he was certain of the place; the tribe, about five hundred strong, ruled over by the father of his friend Tean, lived right along the bay, and scattered in palm-thatched huts throughout the district. Then he remembered certain cocoa-nut palm he used to climb, a spring of water in a thicket of hibiscus, a little stream which he used to dam, and then divert the course to take the fish, and sitting down, all his past life came back to him. As he himself would say "C'était le bon temps; pauvre Tean il doit être Areka (chef) maintenant; sa sœur peut-être est morte ou mariée . . . elle m'aimait bien . . ."

But this day-dream dispelled, it struck him that the place looked changed. Where were the low huts in front of which he used to pass his idle hours stretched in a hammock, the little tar patches? The zigzag paths which used to run from house to house across the fields to the spring and to the turtle-pond were all grown up. Cones of grass and rank mimosa scrub, with here and there ropes of lianas, blocked them so he rubbed his eyes and asked himself, Where is the tribe? Vainly he shouted, cooed loudly; all was silent, and his own voice came back to him muffled and startling as it does when a man feels he is alone. At last, following one of the paths less grown up and obliterated than the rest, he entered a thick scrub, walked for a mile or two cutting lianas now and then with his jack-knife, stumbling through swamps, wading through mud, until in a little clearing he came upon a hut, in front of which a man was digging yams. As many of the natives in New Caledonia speak English and few French he called to him in English, "Where black man? Resting upon his hoe, the man replied, "All dead. "Where Chief?" And the same answer, "Chief he dead." "Tean, he dead?" "No, Tean Chief he ill, die soon; Tean inside that house." And Higginson, not understanding, but feeling vaguely that his dream was shattered in some way he could not understand, called out, "Tean, oh, Tean your friend Johnny here!" Then from the hut emerged a feeble man leaning upon a long curved stick, who gazed at him as he had seen a ghost. At last he said, "That you, John? I glad to see you once before I die." Whether they embraced, shook hands, rubbed noses, or what their greeting was is not recorded, for Higginson, in alluding to it, always used to say, "C'est bête, mais le pauvre homme me faisait de la peine."

This was his sickness. "Me sick, John; why you wait so long? you no remember, so many years ago when we spear fish, you love my sister, she dead five years ago When me go kaikai (eat) piece sugar-cane, little bit perhaps fall on the ground, big bird he come eat bit of sugar-cane and eat my life."

Poor Higginson being a civilized man, with the full knowledge of all things good and evil contingent on his state, still was dismayed, but said, "No, Tean, I get plenty big gun; you savey when I shoot even a butterfly he fall. I shoot big bird so that when you go kaikai he no eat pieces, and

The Fair Site

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I have read with good deal of interest what you have had to say about solving the question of a site for the World's Fair. It strikes me that there is only one way of solving that question satisfactorily to all public spirited citizens, and that is to hold it in the people's playground. From what I hear it is the consensus of opinion that of the money spent on the site as much as possible of it should go into permanent improvements. Such as the case Golden Gate Park is the proper place to spend it. Let us put some of it into the purchase of land for the widening of the park and for a noble boulevard, parked and adorned with works of art, connecting the park with the Presidio, and thus we should have the greatest park system in the world. By holding the fair in Golden Gate Park much money could be saved by reason of the fact that there are to be found certain essentials as for example a great athletic field—the Stadium. The money thus saved could be used for extensions. By holding the fair in the park we could acquire for all time a great aquarium, which by the way, should be one of the features of the fair. We could also make the ocean itself as a feature and make sunbathing an unhazardous pastime. The possibilities of our ocean beach for purposes of recreation and pleasure have not yet begun to be realized. In this connection there are certain engineering feats that should suggest themselves to me with a little imagination, and upon which I should gladly descend if I were sure you would allow me the space. But there is plenty of time ahead. For the present it will be sufficient to awaken public sentiment with respect to the importance to San Francisco for all time of holding the fair in Golden Gate Park.

Twin Peaks Recommended

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: There is only one place to hold the World's Fair and that is the warm belt of the Mission, and, believe me, that's where we will hold it if the people have anything to say, for we have the votes. No grander site can be found than the Twin Peaks, the easterly slope thereof, which can be terraced, and rendered most picturesque with beautiful specimens of Mission architecture—the only kind that should be permitted. I'm for the Mission first, last and all the time, and so, I am sure, is Father Crowley.

The Millennium Assured

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I learn from the Examiner that the authorities are not going to give us all the blessings that we were told we should get in connection with the Geary street road as soon as it is operated by the municipality. For instance, there is to be provision for straphangers, and the cars are to get their juice from an overhead trolley. And to make matters worse the road is going to cost the taxpayers an exorbitant sum. All this is very bad, but what is to be done about it? The answer is that the Examiner, E. P. E. Troy and the other ardent advocates of government ownership will get together and set things right. They promised us the Millennium, and they will see that we are not disappointed. They will do that which has never been done on earth—compel our public servants to give the people a square deal. When they persuaded us that government ownership was the proper thing they appreciated their great responsibility, and never for a moment did they think of shirking it. And now that it is up to them to make good they will do so. Watch 'em. If the authorities don't do what is demanded of 'em the Recall will catch them. We must have the Millennium and we will have it if we have to keep recalling faithless public servants for the rest of our precious lives. So let us not worry.

Now He's Amazed

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Last week I expressed astonishment at the report in the Examiner that Mr. Rudolph Spreckels and Mr. James D. Phelan were the escorts of a party of ladies at one of the gay beach resorts. Now I wish to express my amazement at the report in the same paper about the character of the Christmas Jinks at the Bohemian Club. I would not have believed that report had it not been accompanied by a copy of a photograph showing many members of the club in skirts. I am amazed because I never suspected that the Bohemian Club had so many female impersonators among its members.

Ceding the Supreme Court

For a prelibation of the state of affairs that is bound to ensue in the event of our employing the Recall to terrorize judges let us consider the Boughten Bulletin's change of attitude toward some of the members of the Supreme Court. Perhaps one can reflect and speculate on this change of attitude without doing injustice to any of the distinguished members of that tribunal. Yet it must be confessed that the boughten journal's conciliatory manner might seem to argue a receptive mood in one or two of the justices. Far be it from me, however, to assume that such is the case. No man of good reputation should be presumed to be voluntarily incurred the Bulletin's esteem. It is when that journal suddenly abates its hostility to a public servant and indulges in the gentle arts of the seducer it is well that somebody should sound an alarm. And though in this instance no jurist may be in need of kindly intervention, it will at least be of benefit to the public to indicate the dangerous power that is in the hands of a venal press by means of a distinctly journalistic weapon, the Recall.

The Attitude of Other Days

It will be remembered that when the decision in the Schmitz case was rendered the Boughten Bulletin assailed the Supreme Court with great fury. Day after day, week after week, the whole Court was vilified for rendering a decision which has since been upheld by the highest non-official authority known to the legal profession. That decision the Bulletin garbled for the purpose of giving color to its unfair and abusive criticism; every plausible slander that malice could invent was propagated in the days of hysteria by the editor of the Bulletin, and no member of the Supreme Court was vouchsafed immunity. All were attacked tooth and nail, might and main, without exception and without scruple. As a result of that decision Justice Sloss became an outcast from the society of his cronies. For Justice Sloss was the only member of the Court who associated with the partisans of the Spreckels-Phelan cabal. His most intimate friend was their darling puppet the Hon. Frank Dunne, who it will be remembered frothed at the mouth and scolded the whole Court with characteristic indecency much to the joy of his friend Older. Thereafter Judge Dunne and Justice Sloss were seen no more communing in their favorite haunts.

Immunity for Justice Sloss

Briefly I have described the reception that was accorded the Schmitz decision by the patriots of the Bulletin's camp. Now let us take note of such subsequent happenings as seem to bear on the subject under consideration. In the recent campaign Justice Sloss was a candidate for re-election. Not once during the campaign did the Bulletin remind its readers that Justice Sloss participated in the Schmitz decision, but never did it lose an opportunity to traduce his running mate Justice Melvin and yet that gentleman was not on the bench when the decision was rendered. At once it was surmised that Justice Sloss had been forgiven. And what seemed to be corroborative evidence was the Bulletin's criticism of Justice Shaw when he wrote the opinion in the case of Merrill against Barta. Justice Shaw was censured for having "robbed the City of $500,000 worth of property and having given it to the corporations." In this case the Court was unanimous, but nothing was said of Justice Sloss; and yet what the Court did was merely to affirm a decision which Justice Sloss rendered when he was a judge of the Superior Court. Now surely this tender solicitude for Judge Sloss is hardly to be considered without significance. And by no means irrelevant is the circumstance of the renascence of the beautiful friendship between Justice Sloss and Judge Dunne that failed to survive the Schmitz decision and that was interred with many tears. Great souls that know the godlike glory of forgiveness, great hearts that hold not the memory of a wrong, have been reconciled, and once more, that fine friendship that is accompanied by virtue is lodged in great and generous minds. Neither is any longer averse to being seen in the company of the other.

The Boosting of Angellotti

Now for another pregnant set of circumstances. Some days ago the Supreme Court reversed a criminal case because the defendant had been subjected to the menace and compulsion of the "third degree." Justice Angellotti dissented and with him concurred Justices Sloss and Shaw. It is known that the editor of the Bulletin ordered written an editorial condemnatory of the decision of the Court and denunciatory of the "third degree," but presently learning that Justice Melvin had written the prevailing opinion and that Justices Angellotti and Sloss had dissented, the order was revoked and the dissenting Justices, especially Angellotti, who had written the opinion, were commended for the "broad mind, liberal and progressive views which have always characterized their interpretations of the law." In connection with this piece of news it is interesting to reflect that of late it has been rumored that Justice Angellotti, whose most confidential friend among his associates of the bench is Justice Sloss, is in training for the chief justiceship. And at the same time it may be instructive to consider another Bulletin editorial, the one of last week advocating the recall of judicial officers and telling us that had the Recall been on the statute book, the Supreme Court would never have decided the Schmitz case as it did. The question naturally suggests itself: Are there some men on the bench who would have construed the law rather to gratify the mob than to satisfy conscience, and if so who are they? If such there be we can be certain of one thing, viz., that they have much respect for the power of the press and are every ready to conciliate it.

She—They do not live together happily.

He—No. It's the eternal struggle between religion and society. He is as straight-backed as she is straight-front.

Now and Then in Sacramento

I doubt whether it is generally understood that we are now living under a millennial dispensation in so far as politics is concerned. We are given to understand that the sad, bad old days when Colonel Mazuma and his corps of lieutenants gumshoed through the lobbies of the Sacramento hotels and through the gloomy corridors of the capitol have departed never to return. We are told that the regime of the machine has come to an end; that the hated organization with all its works and pomps has been exorcised from the body politic. This is the day of the long-hair. The severe individual who has no sympathy for the foibles of this giddy world is now taking his fling. And we are begged to believe that he has done away with all the old raw ways; that in his train comes virtue, unimpeachable as Caesar's wife ought to have been. It may be so. I lay claim to some understanding of the wicked methods that are supposed to be no more and I may have to admit that I cannot appreciate the sweep of the reform wave. But I have spent a day or so in Sacramento and I brazenly confess that I cannot see the difference between the old ways and the new. If the old machine was bad, I cannot see where the new machine is an improvement on it. For these new men, these reformers, have a machine; a cogged, oiled, smooth-running and effective machine such as their wicked predecessors never possessed. We may be in the millennium, but if we are, the millennium is not what it was cracked up to be.

The New Organization

Fashions change and men adapt themselves to the changes. There was a time when legislators received their orders in words of one syllable and in bad grammar. They executed them no less handily on that account. Today the lawmakers in Sacramento are the servants of high brow masters. The program is couched in the cant terms that the muckrakers of the magazines have made so popular. "Conscience" and "moral obligation" and "allegiance to the will of the people," are bandied about as though the words represented the most commonplace conditions. It is a strange argot and a staggering one at first; but when one realizes that it cloaks the old villainies and gilds the rascalities that are as ancient as legislatures it loses its force and induces a feeling of contempt. To discover that men are endowing their bad deeds with high-falutin' names is interesting but not impressive. And that is what seems to be the matter with the present session of the legislature; it is a pecksniffian session. What used to be a cinch bill is now a reform measure, but it smells just as bad to the unfortunate man who is cinched. At the same time it has a much better chance of passing than in the days of yore, for the hypocrite is always harder to unmask than the unblushing rogue. It may be inferred that this session should prove a very profitable one for some of the professional Pecksniffs. Let us wait and see whether the inference is justified.

The New Boss

It is worth while studying the character of the man who is shepherding the long-hairs at the capital. He is a man of no mean ability, is Meyer Lissner. There are brains under his soft white hat. He is an adept in the card-index system of politics which is the fad just now. He has the patience to tabulate the men with whom he deals, even if he lacks the qualities of heart that would make them his friends. Years of experience in the Los Angeles real estate market—a very pretty field for business education—have made him shrewd, careful and hard to circumvent. In fact he is a man endowed with a good many of the attributes that are necessary to a political boss. He is not afraid to use the goad on the weak and has no compunction about overreaching those simple souls who pretend to acumen but have it not. But Meyer Lissner has no magnetism, no power of individual attractiveness. You are far from being charmed when you speak to him; on contrary you are unimpressed. So there are no ties to bind him to the men with whom plays politics. When the common interest the moment has been exhausted, they will glad to be delivered from his association. In fact, Lissner seems to have no friends. There are who stick to him, but they do seem to seek his company in other than the business moments. Chester Rowell, Mars Stimson, Lieutenant Governor Wallace and or two others may have a sincere feeling of liking for Lissner, but they do not express it enthusiastically. And other men are very free in declaring their dislike of him. The sentiment is to be heard everywhere among legislators. No matter how diverse their views on other subjects the legislators seem to be remarkably unanimous in disliking Meyer Lissner. He has attempted to wield too much power, one thing. Wherever he turned after election, when he was undoubtedly carried away by his success, he trod on somebody's toes. The reformers of the Call's editorial sanctum were the first to turn on him and they have waxed exceedingly bitter. It is said that Governor Johnson has cooled in his affection toward him but that is not surprising. The governor has cooled towards a number of reformers who stood by him valiantly in the fight; witness change of feeling toward "Bill" Kent.

A Story on Lissner

Meyer Lissner used to be an Oakland man. That was a good many years ago and he cannot have made much of a stir in the community for he is very indistinctly remembered. It seems that either he or his brother was in the jewelry business and there is a pretty prevalent that an office for the arrangement of financial difficulties on a collateral basis was part of the establishment. At any rate they are telling the story on Lissner which may or may not be true. To appreciate it one must know something of the ways of pawnbrokers, but that is either here nor there. The story is that a newspaper man called to interview Lissner at his Sacramento headquarters. Lissner was busy with his card was presented and kept him waiting terminably. Finally the newspaper man had an inspiration. He took a blank card, wrote the number of his watch on it and sent it in to Lissner. And the story runs that Lissner, recognizing the number, rushed out to see him. It is probably a purely apocryphal story, but it is not lacking in significance. It would never have occurred to the currency it has if Lissner were not so busy. It is told between chortles and retold with guffaws. Decidedly Lissner is not popular.

The Patronage Argument

Around the hotel lobbies in Sacramento they are telling interesting stories of the manner in which patronage was used to assure the election of Judge Works. There is the case of the San Joaquin legislators, for instance. Senator Lewis of Stockton was instructed for Works, but openly expressed his contempt for him. Assemblyman Brown of Stockton was instructed for Spalding. They both voted for Works, one against his inclinations, the other against his instructions. It is said that they would not have stood in line unless Walter Parrish had been made secretary of the senate. Walter Parrish is the secretary of the State Hospital at Stockton, but he wanted the Sacramento job too—and he got it. As he is without experience in the work which is of a very complicated character, it was necessary to employ a man who knew the ropes. So Frank Brannon of this city, the veteran of many a legislature, was employed as "legislative expert," to do the job, at six dollars per day. If it had not been necessary to take care of Parrish, Brannon might have been given the title and salary of secretary, thus saving the State an extra employee. In politics is politics and the program must be pushed through at all cost.

The Lieutenant-Governor's Mistake

A man's religion should not be made the subject of curbstone conversation, but there are times when this convention is overlooked. On these occasions are pretty apt to have nothing to do with the character of the religion, but to be very intimately concerned with the character of the man. The case of the lieutenant-governor is in point. As far as I have been able to ascertain, he has not made a hit with the legislators. And they refer with more or less disrespect to his religious belief which happens to be that of the late Mrs. Eddy. Poor jokes are told on it; flippant remarks passed about it. It is not only impolite but uncharitable, but it shows that Lieutenant-Governor Wallace is not yet secure of the respect of his associates. On the second day of the session, when Senator Caminetti of Amador was roaring about the shabby treatment of the minority in the vexatious matter of patronage, Wallace referred to him as "Brother Caminetti." Some of the senators snickered and some asked sotto voce if he thought that he was in his lodge or in his church. To make matters worse, Wallace corrected himself. This is a small matter, but after all, the legislature is a gathering of small minds and on small minds small matters impinge to the detriment of more important things. I am afraid that "Brother Wallace" has a hard row to hoe.

The Sorrow of a Private Secretary

E. Forrest Mitchell, late private secretary to Governor Gillett, is one of the saddest men in the State just now. Mitchell is a party to the shattering of a tradition, but he is not impressed with the importance of his role. It has always been the custom for a retiring governor to give his private secretary a good berth, just as it is the custom for the President to do the same thing. Governor Gage made his secretary, Will Davis, attorney for the Harbor Commission, a very desirable position. Governor Pardee made his private secretary, Arthur Ellston, attorney for the State Board of Health. Some time before his term expired Governor Gillett saw to it that his private secretary, E. C. Cooper, succeeded Myron Wolf as Insurance Commissioner. At the same time he advanced his executive secretary, Forest Mitchell of Fresno, to the vacated position. But when the time came for Gillett to turn over his office to Hiram Johnson, he made no provision for Mitchell. That caused a good deal of talk and the reason for the breach of tradition was very freely canvassed. And now the cause seems to be cleared up. It is said that Gillett does not approve of Mitchell's conduct. It is whispered that Gillett who is inclined to be straitlaced, thinks that Mitchell had too many good times in Sacramento and that Mitchell was too fond of his motor boat which from time to time was a conspicuous object on the river. The story may be exaggerated—and then again it may be correct. Certain it is that whatever may be the relations between Gillett and Mitchell, Mrs. Gillett and Mrs. Mitchell have always been cordial friends.

Eddie Wolfe's Record

Senator Eddie Wolfe has a unique record on the United States Senatorship. During his service in the State Legislature he has been through six contests for the office and has only voted for one winner. In 1897 he was for Samuel M. Shortridge against Perkins. In 1899 he was for Dan Burns. In 1903 he was again in opposition to Perkins. In 1905 he nominated Arthur Fisk against Frank Flint. Two years ago he cast a perfunctory vote for Perkins, there being no opposition. And this time he voted for Spalding.

A Tale of a Dog

Matt O'Brien, the architect, and John P. Horgan, the chief building inspector of the Board of Public Works, are neighbors and close friends. O'Brien has a cocker spaniel called "Jack" which is on terms of palship with Horgan's dog "Major." Every evening masters and dogs take a stroll about the neighborhood of Baker and McAllister streets, the masters holding sedate converse and the two dogs racing, leaping and tumbling over each other in an excess of animal spirits. Both are valuable animals and are kept within doors all day, so that the hour of recreation in the evening is usually their only opportunity of unrestrained freedom. But it happened one evening recently that O'Brien and Horgan did not take their accustomed stroll and thereby hangs this little tale of a dog's remarkable instincts. About half past one in the morning O'Brien was awakened from a sound sleep by the peculiar antics of "Jack." The dog which usually lies quietly in the hall made its way into the bedroom and jumped up on the bed, showing signs of great excitement. Then it scampered out of the room. This curious maneuver was repeated several times and finally O'Brien decided that "Jack" was warning him of the presence of a burglar in the house. He arose, donned his dressing gown and slippers and followed the dog out of the bedroom. "Jack" flew through the hall and down the stairs to the front door. Wondering what this could mean, O'Brien opened the door and there stood "Major" who had escaped from home and come to pay "Jack" a visit. The two dogs held an animated pow-wow on the sidewalk, so animated that O'Brien was in fear of bringing out all the neighbors. There was only one thing to do. He donned his clothes and gave the dogs their constitutional. The unearthly hour made no difference to them; they enjoyed it thoroughly. When it was concluded O'Brien delivered "Major" at the Horgan residence and went home with "Jack," too sleepy to attempt to figure out what instinct impelled the dogs to insist on their usual recreation, no matter how late the hour.

The Jesuits and the Rhodes Scholarship

I note that a junior of St. Ignatius College only nineteen years of age has won the Rhodes Scholarship in competition with the students of our two big universities. And this moves me to offer a suggestion. During the recent convention of the public school teachers of the State all sorts of dissatisfaction with the prevailing methods of teaching found expression. Many of our most experienced public school teachers seem to think that our pedagogical methods are all wrong. Why not investigate the scholastic method of the Jesuit colleges? It must be a good method if it enables a young man to win the Rhodes Scholarship. Perhaps it contains elements which might be adapted to our public school system of education. Certainly it is older than our public school system, if that is any argument. The suggestion is thrown out for what it is worth to the students of pedagogy in our State teaching body.

The Call and Its Clique

My Eatanswill contemporary, the Call, has been wrought up to a high pitch of indignation because the patriots whose praises it has been singing for many months are no better than the frank and practical politicians whom it has been vituperating during the same period. The Call is notoriously erratic. Its principle of loyalty for which it is a thorough-paced stickler is that one should stand by his clique as long as his clique stands by him. True to this principle the Call recently became intolerant of the unscrupulous leaders of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League because they were opposed to the election of Mr. A. G. Spalding to the Senate. The Call was for Mr. Spalding not because he was morally entitled to the office but because he was the friend of the Call's proprietor. Mr. Spalding had justice and decency on his side, but these were things that the Call could not urge with the expectation of being taken seriously. However it could smash the intolerable clique for the manifest iniquity of turning a very mean and shady political trick in the interest of the cheverel-conscionced Works. I sympathize with the Call because I know that Mr. Spalding's cause was just, and because also I know that intellectually he towers above his opponent and is far better able to render efficient service to his country; but nevertheless I can view with something of satisfaction the agony of my vociferous contemporary. Nay, perceiving an element of humor in the situation it titillates my risibles most agreeably. The Call, it will be remembered, at the close of the last session of the legislature "pointed with pride" to the measure by which a long stride was taken toward the election of Senators by direct vote. And the Call, also, it will be remembered, guaranteed the honesty and virtue of the gentlemen who are charged with the duty of putting that measure in force and effect. How amusing, then, to find the Call in a state of frenzy as a result of its own gallant achievements.

"606," the New Specific

When Professor Paul Ehrlich of Frankfort announced the discovery of a specific, which he called for convenience "606," for the cure of one of the most terrible of blood diseases, the medical world hailed him as a benefactor of the race. Now it seems that Professor Eitner has increased the efficiency of the specific by subjecting it to the influence of heat. It is claimed that the importance of Professor Eitner's accidental discovery cannot be exaggerated; that in fact the improved "606" will drive every disease germ from the body. This is a tremendous claim and it will be well to await definite expert pronouncement before accepting it. It takes years sometimes to study the effects of a specific. I asked a physician who keeps abreast of the latest medical experiments what he thought of "606" and he answered that total blindness had resulted in a large number of cases in which it had been used. And "606" has hardly been in use for a twelvemonth.

How It Comes to be Advertised

Many people may be curious to learn how it comes that "606" is being so extensively advertised in the news columns of the papers. Some may think that the proprietors of the specific are paying liberally for the advertising. But they are mistaken. I am told that Professor Paul Ehrlich met James Gordon Bennett of the New York Herald and William Randolph Hearst of the Hearst papers in Europe and so impressed them with the importance of his discovery that they resolved for the good of humanity to give it all the publicity within their power. That explains why, while the name of the disease which "606" is supposed to cure is tabu in most newspaper offices and is left to the inference of readers, the specific itself is being treated as a legitimate and important matter of news. Hearst even indicated by wire the position on the first page of his local paper which he wished the latest "news story" on "606" to receive.

The Profits of Aviation

Will our aviation meet prove a financial success? I sincerely hope so. I trust that the enterprising citizens who have backed the big undertaking will not have the unhappy experience of Fresno. For the Fresno meet was not a financial success, although otherwise it was voted decidedly worth while. I quote from a Fresno paper: "The aviation meet in this city last Friday, Saturday and Sunday, netted the Chamber of Commerce just $47.30, according to a statement made last night at the regular meeting of the executive committee of that organization. The gross receipts of the meet were $5,130.65. Of this amount the aviators received $3,591.45, and the Chamber of Commerce received $1,539.20. The expenses of the meet, borne by the local organization, amounted to $1,491.90, leaving a balance of $47.30. It is expected, however, that this balance will be increased, as arrangements have been made for the sale of the lumber which was used at the time to increase the height of the fence. The report was approved by the executive committee last night. Following its acceptance, the committee firmly resolved never again to attempt to hold an aviation meet in this city."

When Smith Was a Filibuster

Walter Gifford Smith who recently resigned an editorial position on the Chronicle to return to Honolulu and the Honolulu Star, is a man of remarkable vicissitudes. Apropos his leaving town some of the old time newsgatherers recalled the occasion about eighteen years ago when he nearly embroiled the United States and Mexico in war by an ill-advised attempt to run up the American flag in Baja California. The diplomatic relations of the two republics were of such a sort that Smith thought the time had come to take Lower California from Mexico and add it to the United States. With headquarters at Ensenada he organized a filibustering party and formulated an ingenious plan for rushing his soldiers of fortune from San Diego to Ensenada, overpowering the Mexican troops, claiming Lower California for the Stars and Stripes and incidentally covering himself with glory and

A Canal for San Jose

Notice that the public-spirited citizens of San Jose have revived the oft-discussed project of connecting their fair city by water with South San Francisco Bay. San Jose is bursting with civic enterprise and it would not surprise me at all to see this half-million dollar scheme pushed rapidly along the road to realization. I met "Governor" Barney Murphy the other day and asked him what he thought of the proposition. "I was agitated at least forty years ago," he replied; "but there were two objections. In the first place San Jose is ninety feet above tide-water and in the second place there was no water." I must add that these two objections, serious enough in themselves, will not apply to the present plan. The canal is to be a lock affair and there is no intention of using the Guadeloupe River channel or Alviso slough which figured in all previous plans.

A World-Wide Tourist

The California prune is the greatest tourist in the world," remarked Brown, sitting at the daily breakfast table and glancing enviously at the valise all covered with pasters of European labels and steamship lines.

California prunes were on the menu cards of the dining cars from Oakland Pier to New York all on the cards of all the leading hotels of Chicago, Washington and New York. I had them every morning for breakfast on the big ocean liner all the way across the Atlantic, and when I breakfasted at the Cecil, in London, the first and most conspicuous thing on the bill of fare was 'California Prunes.'

"California prunes in London!" ejaculated Mrs. Brown, with surprise. "How on earth do you suppose they got there? Why that is almost one-third of the distance around the world."

Yes, it's a long distance from here, and moreover you may get a dish of them in London as cheaply as in San Francisco."

But, my dear, I have heard you say the railroads charged such high rates that the producers couldn't afford to ship their stuff farther than a woman with a hobble skirt could make in three jumps."

"Yes, from a mouse."

"You didn't say anything about a mouse."

"Well, I meant to. It makes some difference what a woman is jumping from, at, or about. Bill Jones' wife jumped from a mouse the other day and Bill says she circled the room three times every time she jumped."

"But there is a 7,000-mile gap between London and San Francisco."

"Perhaps my comparison was rather ridiculous. When I was a boy and anything went wrong, I whipped my dog. Men are only boys grown tall and when we grow up, instead of whipping the dog, we whip the railroads. But I will admit that when I can go 7,000 miles away, across the Atlantic, and buy a dish of California prunes for breakfast in London, Berlin and Paris as cheaply as in San Francisco or Los Angeles, freight rates haven't much to do with the price or cost of an article. I think, perhaps, if the curtain was pulled aside on the fellows who are howling about freight rates, it would be found that they are doing it to cover up something else."

"But you howled as much as anybody."

"If I didn't, the fellow who paid me a profit of $7.00 on a suit of clothes would butt in and howl too, but against me. I beat him to it and he is satisfied to hear me cuss the railroads. It's an easy and quick way out of it, you know, and it's a scheme that works fine."

"But is it honest?"

"Please do not discuss a dealer's profits and moral ethics at the same time. They don't blend well."

"But honesty is the best policy."

"See here, give me something from Bacon, or Shakespeare, or Bill Nye, but don't spring something that somebody said or concluded after he got caught. Besides, you are leading me away from the original subject. I was talking about California prunes, and what I wanted to remark was that as world-wide tourists and globe trotters they take the blue ribbon."

To Open an Ostrich Feather Store

The Cawston Ostrich Farm of South Pasadena is to open a store at 54 and 56 Geary street. It will be a duplicate of the Los Angeles store which is the finest of its kind and the original one established in this country. The Cawston ostrich feathers are prepared in the Cawston factory from the feathers of the male birds. They have life, lustre, strength and beauty and were awarded the prize medals at Paris, St. Louis, Buffalo, Chicago, Omaha, Portland and Jamestown. Every tourist in California goes to see the Cawston Farm which has been for many years one of the points of interest in Southern California. It is famous for its gigantic ostriches, its beautiful grounds and its magnificent feather products. A visit to Los Angeles is incomplete without a trip to the farm. The farm is something more than an exhibition of ostriches; it is one of the prettiest spots in California, being a semi-tropical park of flowers, palms, trees, etc., with rustic seats, pretty lawns, shaded nooks and a Japanese tea garden. One can see how the ostrich feathers are dyed, curled and handled; also the incubators and young chicks of all ages. The name of Cawston is famous all over the world and the branch store in this city will be appreciated by the people who want the best in this line. The Cawston Farm also intends to open branches in all the important cities on the coast.

Greenway's Notable Failure

Score another triumph for Mr. Ned Greenway. This time it is the most notable of all triumphs, the triumph of failure—of the thing that teaches us what is false and directs us to what is true. In some things that we undertake it is to our credit that we neither command nor deserve success. After all success is merely a matter of concentration, perseverance and instinct, and in these our amiable social leader was found to be lacking when in the abundance of his good nature he essayed the task that was assigned to him at the Bohemian Club, that of aping the manners and appearance of a gay dowager. For success in this role Mr. Greenway lacked the most essential of all things—temperament. In trousers, with or without his claw-hammer Ned has all the self-possession that marks the caste of Vere de Vere, but in lingerie and all the other things foreign to his style of beauty he is as nervous and uneasy as a climber at her first function. In preparation for the jinks Ned took private dancing lessons for a week from a professional artiste, and became quite proficient in ballet stunts, but all the while he wore trousers. When he got into the dress after pulling on—well when completely made-up, he felt his courage overflowing his corsets and oozing out at his garters, and when the curtain went up he was as limp as a lady full of Cordon Rouge. The hero of a thousand cotillions was overcome with stage fright, and he had to cut out his piece de resistance. Now it is certainly not derogatory of a man to say that as a female impersonator he's impossible. That's what I say of Ned Greenway who achieved a failure while other gentlemen performed with so much versimilitude that one might say of them "In any other costume they'd have been just as realistic."

An Embarrassing Announcement

I am told there is nothing so shocking as to have one's death announced at a time when one is quite sensible of being alive, but I can picture to myself circumstances in which it would be much more shocking to read the report of one's engagement to somebody toward whom one entertains no sentimental feeling. So the news of an engagement must come to me pretty well authenticated before I will give it publicity. I draw the line at news of so solemn and sacred a thing as an engagement when it comes over the 'phone from somebody whose voice I do not recognize. It was because one of my daily contemporaries was less cautious that two hearts that do not beat as one were set a-flutter one day last week. By phone came the news of the engagement of Mrs. Beatrice Kelly of Kansas City and Lieutenant Goodrich of the Thirtieth Infantry. The news was communicated by a woman who represented herself as Mrs. Kelly, and said that she was the guest of Lieutenant and Mrs. O. C. Nichols at their home in Infantry Terrace. As soon as Lieutenant Goodrich read of his engagement he rang up the editor and demanded to know the source of his information. He was told it was Mrs. Kelly, but Mrs. Kelly was able to prove an alibi. She was sick in bed at the Nichols home at the time the engagement news was telephoned and as there is no telephone in the Nichols' home it is clear that Mrs. Kelly was not the author of the communication. So the editor who made the blunder kindly consented to announce that the report of the engagement was untrue. It is said the supposition is that the newspaper was duped by some practical joker, but it may turn out that the motive was one of deep design. Lieutenant Goodrich has many friends in society and Cupid is probably on his trail. But why his name should have been linked with Mrs. Kelly's nobody is able to conjecture as they are but very slightly acquainted.

The Hearsts in Society

From a Washington correspondent I receive word that Mr. and Mrs. William Randolph Hearst are beginning to be seen in the most exclusive Washington society. Circles to which Hearst did not penetrate while he was a congressman from New York are now welcoming him and his fair wife. Henceforward when we hear of "Mrs. Hearst" in Washington society, we must not jump to the conclusion that it is Mrs. Phoebe Hearst. It is more than likely that it will be Mrs. Randolph Hearst. For Mrs. Hearst is showing unmistakable signs of social activity. She is a warm friend of Mrs. John R. McLean who can place the stamp of approval upon any woman of social ambitions. Recently Mrs. McLean gave a reception in honor of Mrs. Hearst at her beautiful Washington home and those who were invited were of the most solid social position.

An Arrow for Miss Doe

Miss Marguerite Doe was the center of interest for several minutes at the Orpheum Tuesday afternoon where she was one of a party of girls chaperoned by Mrs. Frederick Van Devend Stott. Her blushes were partially hidden by white lace veil but they were evident just the same when Alice Lloyd as Cupid sang "I'd Send a Dart at You" and one flew straight to the heart of Miss Doe. She was in a stage-box and the singer's aim was sure. The audience was huge delighted and the victim's friends only laughed at her confusion. When in the next number Le Sully said something about a debutante being a girl who comes out, there was more good nature chaffing for Miss Doe who felt she had contributed a large share of the afternoon's amusement. Her friends are still asking about the arrow. Whether it has been kept as a souvenir with some special significance or tossed away Miss Doe will not tell. And why did she wear a veil, knowing the Cupid song was in the program? Did she anticipate possible blushes?

8. Talked Shop

So we are really to have an opera house! That's what some of our millionaires are saying, and I earnestly hope the story is not too good to come true. But for about twelve years I have been hearing the same story. Which reminds me of another story. About ten years ago I was on an ocean liner. Among the passengers was a San Francisco millionaire, a self-made man then lately risen to wealth and now prominent in society. He liked to talk of his rise; so much so that his charming wife who lived and breathed social etiquette was continually admonishing him. Frequently she startled people by expostulating with her husband. Her favorite expression was "Don't be common, Billy!" One day he let us know that he had met Mme. Melba. "We entertained her!" he said "in the red room of the Bohemian Club, but she would bring up business matters." Dear man! he had forever ringing in his ears the admonition "Don't be common, Billy," and felt himself a very naughty boy when he dared to mention business right out before everybody. So he rattled on. "Yes, she became very enthusiastic over having an opera house for San Francisco—something worthy of the great artists who sing there. Then she turned to me. 'Mr. —, you are a very rich man, what will you do toward this project?' she said. But I, realizing that that was no place to talk shop, adroitly changed the subject." His wife did not this time let him not to be common and I am wondering if she has educated him yet up to the idea that being such a rich man he should be one of the first to hand out a few thousands to endow an opera house for the great singers of the world.

9. Guest Surprised

Previous to the dinner at which the engagement of Miss Margaret Calhoun was announced, Mrs. Calhoun laughingly remarked to her daughter, "I'll give you five dollars for every person who is really surprised at the announcement." When the formal announcement was made one elderly lady was heard to remark, "Well, this is a surprise."

10. Ward's Bride

Note that Dr. James Ward has reached home with his bride. The new Mrs. Ward is an attractive woman and will no doubt assume a place in society, for hers is an old family. Before her first marriage to Frederick Johnson, she was Sophie Gibbs. The Gibbs girls as Sophie, Helen and Virginia were called, were the nieces of the well known George W. Gibbs who left thousands to Grace Church when he died. The family has always been one of staunch Episcopalianism. It is said that the romance between Dr. Ward and Mrs. Fred Johnson had its origin when the doctor was treating Fred Johnson on his deathbed. He died two years ago and some months later Dr. Ward and his wife separated, because of temperamental differences. The recent marriage took place in Milwaukee and I don't think that any of the Gibbsses were present.

Scandal of a "Waiter"

The report that there was a waiter among the guests at a recent ball at the Fairmont is untrue. Whispered about for a week after the affair it finally reached the ears of the hostess. She was naturally indignant and complained to the management of the hotel. An investigation was made both by the management and the hostess who on her own account interviewed some of her guests. The result was an explanation that has caused much merriment. It appears that in her endeavor to have enough men at her party the hostess invited a number of bachelors who are not usually "among those present" because they prefer their clubs to the whirl of society. Accepting her invitation they found themselves strangers to the younger element and many introductions were required. Thus, a girl to whom a man had just been presented, would turn and pass him on to another without mentioning his name, in many cases because she herself had not caught it. One of these anonymous partners was dancing with a debutante who made sundry covert attempts to identify him. Finally he accused her of it. "Well, who are you?" she asked frankly. The man lowered his voice: "It is a secret." "I'll ask the girl who introduced you," she threatened. "But she doesn't know either," he averred. "I'll tell you if you can keep a secret. I'm one of the waiters. There were not enough men so I turned in to help. Promise not to tell." The girl was shocked. She didn't know whether to stop dancing and make a scene or to finish the two-step and then tell her hostess, deciding finally on the latter course. But by the time the dance was ended her partner had proved so agreeable that she couldn't bring herself to expose him. She did however warn a few others and the story spread. It had become a scandal when the hostess ran it to earth the other day. The "waiter" proved to be a member of the University Club.

From Campus to Altar

Another University campus romance has its sequel in the announcement of the engagement of Miss Muriel Catherine Turner of the exclusive Alpha Phi Sorority and Mr. Thomas Boardman Smith of the Kappa Sigma fraternity. Miss Turner is the only daughter of Henry H. Turner, vice-president and manager of the Grange Company of Modesto, and one of the leading citizens of the southern section of the State. Mr. Smith is the son of Thomas N. Smith, the well known mining engineer. He is secretary of the Alex. S. Beyfuss advertising and publishing house and is connected with the Sunset Magazine. The wedding will be an event of the early spring.

The Cinderellas Were Happy

I am given to understand that the old regime was very, very happy at the Cinderella ball. The members of those families which secretly regard themselves as the aristocracy of the city rejoiced in the absence of the climbers and the new rich. One matron prominent in the old regime was heard to remark that she felt young again, seeing her old school friends scattered about the room. She must have been powerfully affected to have such a strange feeling, for she hasn't been to school for many, many years. Some of the old-timers have been treated leniently by time; others have not. But they all seemed to have a good time, so there is no reason why anybody should grow sentimental about them.

The Bishop's Rude Awakening

There is an episcopal bishop from another State stopping at the St. Francis Hotel who thinks that the methods of California hotel employees are just a trifle hasty. And he cannot be blamed. It happened that a well known professional man of this city was so filled with the spirit of the New Year's Eve celebration that he continued it for a whole week. Realizing then that it was time to stop, he went to Dr. J. B. Westwick who is in charge of the baths at the St. Francis and stated that he had important business to attend to on the following morning and that it was absolutely necessary that he be rubbed and pounded into proper condition. Dr. Allen of the hotel was consulted and prescribed a course of treatment after which the professional man was put to bed in his room. Before retiring he impressed upon the night operator of the baths the importance of his appointment in the morning. "Leave word with the man who will be on duty in the morning," he said, "that he must come to my room, yank me out of bed and massage me into good condition. Tell him not to mind how much I fight or argue. I must be gotten up, even against my own wishes." The night man promised faithfully, but he mistook the number of the room. In the morning the massage man nearly caused a panic in the hotel by trying to force the episcopalian bishop through a course of treatment which he hadn't ordered and didn't want, while the professional man slept peacefully through the hubbub in a nearby room.

Principal Malloy, "seem to be the most susceptible to matrimonial tendencies." The inference to be drawn from his remark is that Principal Malloy wants only brunette teachers in the Longfellow School. Which proves just how brave a man Principal Malloy is. For he has hurled defiance at womankind. The blondes will resent his recommendation because they are sure to con-brunettes! How they will rage at the slight to their charms! Have they no fascinations for the man of marriageable condition? It seems to me that Principal Malloy has invoked the whirlwind.

"The Nigger"

By Theodore Bonnet

Notwithstanding its title I went to a performance of "The Nigger" with no prejudicial preconceptions. I knew that it was the work of a college-made dramatist, and that it had received the approval of the authorities of the New Theatre, an institution which affects high ideals in respect of the drama and pretends to serve some of the lofty purposes of an academy devoted to the cultivation of the literary art and the maintenance of certain principles and standards of taste. Knowing these things, when I entered the Savoy I was prepared to be edified. I was entirely free from the spirit of carping criticism. I was in quest of proofs of power, not of weakness; of substantial excellence, not of minor defects. I was as open to conviction as a humble undergraduate at the feet of a learned professor of Malabar. The play opened in a manner that gave promise of gratifying my high expectations. The curtain went up on a scene de-down. This is a pretty big and thrilling episode for a first act. It is a play in itself, and it overshadows everything else in the act, causing one to forget for the moment that the Sheriff has been nominated for Governor and that he has a sweetheart and that consequently there is a love affair in process of development that should command one's interest. From this it might seem that right at the start the most important of the unities, the unity of circumstance, is violated, but not exactly so, for the lynching of the negro is a circumstance that makes for atmosphere, and besides the catastrophe which comes in the second act (this being a three-act play) is precipitated by a race riot, which, though it happens ten months after the thrilling episode of the first act is at any rate I suppose, due to the usual cause. In the second act the hero as Governor is employing stern measures to restore law and order. He decides on making the State "dry," much to the consternation of a distillery owner who knows that the Governor has negro blood in his veins, a startling fact of which even the Governor himself is unaware. For the purpose of intimidation the distillery man makes use of his knowledge, but in vain. The result is, however, that the Governor discloses the truth to his sweetheart, and at the close of the tense, dramatic scene that follows the hero is spurned and his betrothed makes a most spirited exit. This is all very interesting and somewhat sensational, but it comes far from realizing one's expectations. The truth is that the story, though its characters move amid circumstances new to the stage, is vitalized with the most conventional of conflicts. The breaking off of an engagement because of a blood taint is not a new invention in fiction. The attempt to blackmail a public servant by threatening him with humiliation is a most familiar piece of villainy. But it is capacious to complain that an author has not introduced us to new emotions. All that a dramatist ought to be expected to do is to tell his story effectively. This Mr. Sheldon has not done. He has given us episodes, but he has not mirrored the life of the people by whom they were experienced. He has given us a pathetic story illumined here and there by rays of pure feeling, relieved by some fine traits of character, but on the whole leaving an impression which the mind gladly seeks to efface. He has handled a big subject in a small way, and he is therefore disappointing. Supplied with the ingredients of a strong play the fusing heat of emotion which melts the substances of a drama into one harmonious whole is lacking. With a stirring pregnant problem in the background of the life which he feebly depicts he merely permits us to glimpse it. He never attempts to take hold of it or to enable us to apprehend the circumstances in which it flourishes. To the psychology of it he is indifferent. He merely makes conditions give color to circumstance, and in this he does not show much skill, for with one exception his characters are not drawn with vigorous and life-like touches, and they convey no clear idea of the temperament of either the white people or the black people of the South. The one exception is Clifton Noyes, President of the Noyes Distillery, and he is not peculiar to any section of the country. He is typical of the selfish business man in politics. Noyes figures in a scene which is the redeeming inspiration of the whole composition, a scene in which first by cajolery and then by threats he seeks to prevent the signing of a prohibition measure. And by the way prohibition seems to be the playwright's solution of the problem that vexes the South. As to the performance of the play it is hardly fair to pass judgment on mummies in such roles as Mr. Sheldon has provided for them. If George Barbier appears to excel all others in the cast it is probably because the character of Clifton Noyes is the only one with red corpuscles. And yet I fancy that in competent hands the hero would not appear to be essentially theatrical. How Florence Roberts was ever persuaded that she was temperamentally qualified for a Billy Burke role passeth my understanding.

Pepito Arriola

Every little while a great musical genius is discovered only to be lost sight of after a few years, sometimes never heard of again. An exception is Josef Hoffman whose playing astonished the world at the age of six, and now we are to hear the Spanish lad, Pepito Arriola, twelve years of age, who gave his first concert in Paris at the age of three, and who at seven appeared under the great conductor, Nickisch, with an orchestra of one hundred players at the Leipzig Gewandhaus, and who has since appearlightfully characteristic of the South as we have come to know it through the medium of the theatre—a garden scene bathed in a soft moonlight, with the entrance to a home of the Colonial pattern on one side and the familiar old colored servant animating the foreground. Of theatrical contrivance conducive to atmosphere there was nothing lacking. Presently the plot was in process of development, and soon I received the impression that a thesis-play was unfolding, one dealing with a very large and vital subject, the eternal negro problem. In the very first act which is properly devoted to exposition I learned that a negro had outraged a girl. The regulation mob had been organized, the bloodhounds were in the culprit's trail, I heard them barking just as I used to hear them in the old days when they were crossing the ice in "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Now the terror-stricken fugitive falls into the hands of the Sheriff, and a moment later, into the hands of the mob; and then the curtain goes

A Great Artist Neglected

With all our boasted love of the vocal art scant notice did we take of Mme. Gerville-Reache. At her first concert it was not surprising that the audience was small, for though she is noted as an artist in New York and in European cities she was unknown here in the enlightened provinces. But it was to be expected that after that first concert the news of her artistry and of the joy that she is capable of diffusing would spread, and that at her second concert the hall would be overflowing with lovers of sublime song. For did we not discover Tetrazzini? And don't we know what's what in every kind of art? To be sure, but we neglected Mme. Gerville-Reache just the same. And yet she is one of the world's great contraltos; and contraltos are somewhat rarer than sopranos. There are few genuine contraltos. I did not know until I heard Mme. Gerville-Reache that in all the world there was another voice like Schumann-Heink's. Mme. Gerville-Reache has a voice of extensive range, every note she produces perfectly and every note is of true contralto quality. As to her art it is the acme of perfection, and after hearing her in one song it is not necessary to be told that she has already taken her place among the songbirds of first rank. She is a very dramatic singer, and gives one the impression that she is an effective actress. As yet, she is not content with putting every expression in her vocal interpretation, but gesticulates and calls facial expressions into play quite as if acting a role. I fancy this is something that the diva will change after a few seasons of concert work, though she is charming in every movement. Mme. Gerville-Reache does not look to have reached thirty—an immature age for a cantatrice. And yet she has already scored some big triumphs in operas with Tetrazzini, Cavalieri, Garden and Caruso. When passe artists come along as they sometimes do they sing to crowded houses. Are we to infer that the people of this city care more for a name than they do for a voice?

The Drummer for Hero

"The Traveling Saleman" is coming to the Columbia next Monday night for one week. This is a play that deals with the typical experiences of the drummer, and of course if they are true to life they are provocative of much laughter. The comedy is reported to be the "real thing," and that this reputation is deserved may be inferred from the fact that among the drummer's experiences is that of being marooned over Christmas Day in a one-night stand in Indiana, where the snow is thick on the ground, the hotel cold and the prohibition law so strictly enforced that to obtain liquor one must have it smuggled into his room in a cup. There is a strong vein of sentiment running through the play tempering the comedy and making it all the more delicious.

Jarislav Kocian, Violin Virtuoso

Jarislav Kocian, the Bohemian violin virtuoso, will make his re-appearance in this city after a lapse of ten years at Christian Science Hall next Sunday afternoon, January 15, and from all reports we are to hear some violin playing such as one hears but seldom in a lifetime. Kocian is said to possess that quality called "charm" without which the greatest virtuoso fails to thoroughly grip his audience. Mr. Maurice Eisner, pianist, will assist. Kocian's offerings will be the new violin "Concerto" in G minor by d'Ambrosio, "Andante and Preludium" Bach, "Humoresque" Kocian, "Adagio" Ries, "Zephyr" Hulbay and "I Palpiti," Paganini. For this concert seats are now on sale at Sherman Clay & Co's. The second Kocian concert will be given Thursday night, January 19, when the artist will play Tschaiowsky's "Concerto," Paganini's "Witches Dance," Sauret's "Farafila" and works by Bach, Goldmark and Kocian. At the farewell concert Sunday afternoon, January 22, Lale's "Symphonie Espagnole," Bach's "Chacenne" and Wieniawski's "Faust" Fantasie will be the principal offerings. In Oakland Kocian will repeat his opening program next Friday afternoon, January 20, at Ye Liberty Playhouse at 3:30. For this event the seats may be obtained at the theater box office Monday morning.

"The White Sister" at the Alcazar

Marion Crawford's last play, "The White Sister," will be given its initial presentation in a stock theater next Monday evening at the Alcazar, with Evelyn Vaughan in the title part, Bertram Lytell as Captain Giovanni Severi, Viola Leach (her first appearance) as the Countess Chiamonti, Louis Bennison as Monsignor Saracinesca and the remainder of the company in suitable roles. Viola Allen starred in this play last season, and when it was presented in a downtown theater the critics praised it highly.

Maxine Elliott Coming

"The Nigger" with Florence Roberts and her company, including Thurlow Bergen, will be presented for the last time at the Savoy this Sunday evening and on Monday Miss Maxine Elliott will begin an engagement limited to six nights in her jolly nautical comedy, "The Inferior Sex." By the care and taste of its setting, the distinguished quality of its acting and a role which suits Miss Elliott's voice and manner "The Inferior Sex" gives promise of going into theatrical history as the star's greatest comedy success. Miss Elliott will have the same support which surrounded her during the two New York runs of the piece. "The Chocolate Soldier," that long-awaited opera bouffe, with one hundred or twenty-five people, will follow Miss Elliott at the Savoy.

A Beel Concert

Sigmund Beel, the violinist who has been absent for fifteen years concertizing in Europe, and who is visiting his old home for a few months will give two concerts at Christian Science Hall the dates being Thursday evening, February 11 and Sunday afternoon, February 5. Mr. Beel will play in Oakland at Ye Liberty on Friday

Cale Coming

Inma Calve is giving scenes from opera in cosume on her present tour assisted by Galileo Gavari, a tenor, reputed to be in the Caruso-Boni class. Her acting and singing combined are said to enthuse her audiences as much as in former years. Her work in the Mad Scene from "Abroise Thomas' "Hamlet," reports agree, surpasses anything ever offered on the concert stage.
Cale is now in Hong-Kong and will arrive in this city in February and after completing her arrangements with Manager Greenbaum will leave at once for a tour of America opening in Canada. Her appearances in this city will be about the middle of March.

Arther Good Bill at the Orpheum

The Five Cycling Auroras who have been a feature of the Tower Circus, England, and who have been brought to this country for a tour of the Orpheum Circuit, will make their first appearance here at the Orpheum next week. Lillian Bishart, the popular and accomplished comedienne, will reappear after quite a lengthy absence and is sure of a most cordial reception.
She presents "What Every Woman Wants."
Juni Tannen, "the Chatterbox," will introduce his clever and amusing monologue. Ernest Scurff, said to be the most versatile musician in the world, plays with equal skill a stageful of instruments. Charles Leonard Fletcher and his company will return with the interesting drama

"His Nerve." Elise, Wulff and Waldo, the famous Hanlon Brothers, Bonita and Lew Hearn, will close their engagement with this bill.

One More Tetrzzini Concert

Ever since the last Tetrzzini concert the box office at Sherman Clay & Co's. has been besieged with inquiries as to whether there is to be another concert and now comes the answer.
Manager W. H. Leahy has decided to give one more concert at Dreamland the date being set for next Saturday night, January 21. It has been also decided to make this a request program, and requests for any particular numbers may now be sent to the box office at Sherman Clay & Co's. Paul Steindorff and his excellent orchestra will again assist. The "diva" leaves the following day for Los Angeles and then on to Denver, Kansas City and the far East. The sale of seats will open next Wednesday morning and mail orders will receive careful attention if addressed to Will L. Greenbaum accompanied by check or money order. The general admission seats in the balcony of which there will be 1500 may also be secured at the box office in advance thus saving an unpleasant wait in the line at the last moment.

Oakland to Enjoy "Billy"

Oakland is to have an opportunity of enjoying the fun of "Billy," the farce in which the Alcazar players have been scoring so heavily this week, for that is the piece Manager Bishop announces for presentation by his stock company at Ye Liberty Playhouse for the week commencing next Monday evening. Judging from the manner in which the play has been received in this city, to say nothing of its Eastern triumphs, a week of genuine fun is in store for transbay theatergoers. George Friend will have the title role in "Billy" at Ye Liberty and in the fun-making he will have the assistance of the complete roster of the company, while the setting of the play, the upper deck of an ocean liner, will be most realistically shown on the big revolving stage. After one week of the farce-comedy Ye Liberty will offer the first popular priced production to be given anywhere of "The Servant in the House."

Frank Belcher Coming

Frank Belcher is coming to town in "The Chocolate Soldier." He will be seen and heard at the Savoy, and his friends will be seen and heard also. Frank Belcher is bound to get a big reception. Never did a more popular singer leave this city to take up the study of the vocal art in foreign parts. Frank Belcher was a member of the Olympic Club, the Corinthian Yacht Club and Stanford Parlor, N. S. G. W., and in the old days he figured as the headliner in all their entertainments. After studying some years in Italy he went on the stage, and he has had many triumphs in opera and musical comedy.

"The Girl in the Taxi" Coming

The press and the public of Paris, Berlin, Chicago, Boston and other cities where "The Girl in the Taxi" has been presented are unanimous in acclaiming it as the greatest laugh producer ever devised for the delight of theatregoers who go to the playhouse to be amused.
The long runs which "The Girl in the Taxi" has scored in these large and discerning amusement centers indicate the play's powers to delight the spectator. The New York World said: "The Girl in the Taxi' is one of the merriest shots that ever set the Astor theatre rocking with laughter. The house was packed to the last inch of standing room and at every short interval roars of merriment swept across in gales, completely stopping the dialogue at times."

"The Girl in the Taxi" will be seen at the Columbia Monday the 23rd.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—In the closing operations of the week in the stock market aggressive bull tactics were the feature with some fair gains in the market leaders in the week's dealings. The rise was accomplished with practically no public interest as there was no incentive to buy securities with the unfavorable railway returns coming to hand and the depressing outlook in the steel industry. However, it is consoling to know that these factors represent the past and are about the worst to be looked for. The next turn will be for the better, and it is this that the stock market is anticipating in conjunction with the solution of the freight rate question. Subject to moderate setbacks we expect to see the leading stocks worked to a higher level.

Cotton—Speculation in cotton for the past week has improved slightly but prices have continued to show a declining tendency. From the highest at the opening of the week to the lowest a decline of about 30 points occurred in the active months. This was caused by a growing feeling in that trade that the crop will reach a total of 12,000,000 bales which at the present rate of spinners takings would have the largest surplus at the close of the season on record. Domestic trade in cotton goods has remained quiet and it is believed the high cost of living together with the present high cost of the raw material must operate to bring about a curtailment of production in American mills and must inevitably affect the consumption in this country. We see no reason to change our views and believe prices will work lower.

Wheat—Last week saw a good sized advance in wheat with the May option leading the advance. The former delivery represents the present crop of wheat and the latter the new crop of wheat now subject to the rigors of spring and early summer possibilities. With the new crop lying dormant in the fields, it is of course too early for it to be a live issue with the present grain trade. The extent of the revival in the demand for cash wheat for milling during the few weeks will be watched with much interest. It is a foregone conclusion that there will be an improvement as the demand in the past has been poor. There is nothing in the situation, however, to indicate that buyers anywhere will depart from their recently successful policy of buying wheat and flour as they need it. There is also nothing in the trade showing of supplies of flour in the various positions to indicate that there will be any very urgent needs soon. That speculators may exaggerate such business as is done is, however, a foregone conclusion. The present leadership in the speculative market cannot claim as confident a following as that enjoyed during the campaign of two years ago. Continued light marketings from the interior may help the buying of futures.

Corn—Prices advanced moderately last week, largely under the combined influence of the strength in wheat, severe weather which reduced marketings, unfavorable crop news from Argentine and determined buying of corn by the bull leaders who have a double interest in keeping it advancing with the wheat. There has been no disposition on the part of buyers of cash corn to follow the bulges in the futures; quite the reverse, in fact, as shipping sales ran down to very small proportions toward the ends. Meanwhile the severe cold has brought a much larger proportion of the Ohio and Indiana crops into safe shipping condition than before, and it looks very much as though a large part of the corn offered for sale by producers in this and more western states would pile up at centers of accumulation.

Navigation on the Tigris

"It ought to be of interest to all who would like to see the Mississippi River made navigable the year round to know that the present navigation of the Tigris, the historic stream beside which ancient Babylon stood, and where modern Bagdad now stands, was made possible by a study of the boats in use on the river at St. Louis," said Frederick Simpich, United States Consul at Bagdad, Turkey, who is in this country on furlough. "A big company formed for the purpose of navigating the Tigris sent an Englishman on tour to learn methods employed on rivers in other countries. This man came quietly to St. Louis, took a trip down the Mississippi, and made a careful study of boats of light draught and heavy tonnage. He reported to his employers in favor of the Mississippi boats, and now they are the sort which carry the travellers to and from the place we used to read about when we were children, the home of Ali Baba and the host of characters interesting to juvenile minds."

rged with the semi-savage, thinking, as men will his, that even death can be kept off with words.
Tean smiled and said, "Johnny, you savey but you no savey all. This time I die. You hoot bird he turn into a mouse, and mouse at I eat, just the same bird." This rather ttered Higginson, and he felt his theories beino vanish, and he began to feel a little angry;
ut really loving his old friend, he once more adressed himself to what he now saw might be a ojless task.
go Noumea get big black cat, beautiful cat, ll the same tiger—you savey tiger, Tean—glossy nofat, long tail and yellow eyes; when he see nose he eat him; you go bed sleep, get up, and oo quite well." Tean, who by this time had haged his position with his friend, and become u of his knowledge a philosopher, shook his re sadly and replied, "You no savey nothing, ot; when black man know he die there is no
ot. Suppose cat he catch mouse, all no use; nose go change into a big, black cloud, all the are rain. Rain fall upon, and each drop burn ig into my bones. I die, John, glad I see you;
black man all die, black woman no catch baby, ri only fifty 'stead of five hundred. We all go somewhere, into the clouds. Black men and the men, he no can live. New Caledonia (as o call him) not big enough for both."
That happened after Higginson never told, owhen he reached that point he used to break into a perfect torrent of half French, half Eng-is oaths, blaspheme his gods, curse progress, rail t civilization, and recall the time when all the ric were happy, and he and Tean in their youth et spearing fish. And then bewildered, and as f half-conscious that he himself had been to line, would say, "I made the roads, opened the nes, built the first pier, I opened the island;
he pauvre Tean, il-me faisait de la peine . . .

biscus wreath . . . ah, well, pauvre petite . . .

Auto Notes

Since taking delivery a few weeks ago of two Cartercar delivery trucks of 1000 pounds capacity each the local branch of Hale Brothers has been using the vehicles in particularly strenuous service. These two machines were bought after the purchasers had spent over a year making demonstrations from the various commercial vehicles on the local automobile market. And a thorough test has been made of the efficiency of all in the delivery service. The Cartercars were delivered just in time to meet the requirements of the holiday trade.

Among the American cars which have been used extensively this past season in European touring is the Lozier. According to advices received by the Pioneer Automobile Company some twenty Lozier owners advised the Lozier factory of their intended tours of Europe. To meet any possible needs of these tourists supplies of extra parts were shipped to central points in the old world and in every instance these supplies were returned, the boxes in which they were sent being unopened. Not one Lozier out of all that were used this year in Europe found it necessary to call for an extra part.

The local branch of the Diamond Rubber Company has just received a letter from R. C. Hamlin who used Diamond tires on his Franklin in the Los Angeles Phoenix Race. The letter reads, "I beg to advise you that the Diamond Tires used on my Franklin car in the recent Los Angeles to Phoenix race over 418 miles of the roughest kind of desert roads, went through without a scratch and with Los Angeles air. It gives me great pleasure to boost the merits of tires that are so absolutely dependable."

With their chief Hugh Chalmers who presented Lajoie and Cobb with their automobiles it seems that the entire Chalmers organization are baseball enthusiasts. This supposition is borne out by a report recently received by the Pioneer Automobile Co., stating that William C. Hirsig of the Deeds & Hirsig Manufacturing Co., representatives in Nashville for the Chalmers Motor Company, has been elected president of the Nashville Baseball Club of the Southern League.

W. B. Cochran, vice-president and general manager of the Haynes Auto Sales Co., wires from Los Angeles that the automobile show there was a tremendous success. The Haynes fore door types attracted extensive interest, their control levers which are built inside the fore doors being declared among the most marked conveniences shown by the 1911 models.

The Consolidated Motor Car Co. reports a large number of deliveries for the past week. Among those made are a Brewster Green, elegantly upholstered limousine, to Mrs. Judge F. W. Henshaw, a Royal blue limousine to Dr. T. E. Bailey, a five passenger fore door touring car to Leonard Abbot, a five passenger touring car to W. E. Lovelad and a seven passenger fore door touring car to the City of Oakland for the use of the chief of police.

Every automobile driver will admit that the efficiency of accessories plays a large part in any automobile's running ability and that much importance must attach to equipment where a record of any decided merit is made. It is because of this that the local branch of the Weinstock, Nichols Company take special pride in the fact that the Cadillac was equipped with a Schebler carburetor on the record Los Angeles run.

"The Horsemen of the Plains"

Though "The Horsemen of the Plains" is a boys' book it is very far from being a "juvenile" in the accepted sense of that adjective. The text concerns the adventures of a boy, Bob Norton, who when he stood on the banks of the Missouri river at Omaha, with his most valuable possession, a good rifle in his hands, was seventeen years old. Bob was an orphan whose father had been killed in the war, and now, in 1866, he had his own way to make in the world and his eyes were turned towards the west. As he stood there watching some returned trappers and hunters with their bales of furs and deciding in his own mind that the life appealed to him more than any other, he was clapped on the shoulder and addressed by a cheery voice which proved to belong to an experienced trapper. Sam Strong was the leader of an organized party of six men who had hunted together long and often enough to prove each other's mettle. They were then about to start on an expedition and had agreed to enlarge their circle by one man, the choice being left to Strong, who was a keen student and quick observer, as a man following his occupation had need to be. The attraction between him and Bob was mutual, and the boy was invited to accompany the man to meet the others with a view to the general verdict. He made a good impression on them all and was accepted as a member of the party, an equal sharer in its profits as, of course he was in its dangers. As good trapping grounds were already becoming scarce, from the night that they left Omaha until, some two years later, they were once more safe in civilization, they were kept busy eluding other hunters intent on ousting them from their reserves or despoiling them of their pelts. Bob's natural faculties improved under the guidance and tutorship of his friends and before the end of the season he had become an expert woodsman. During part of one summer they explored a stretch of the Colorado river, then something of a myth to the world at large. Strong's party were of the better class of trappers who did not believe in exterminating the wild animals and they killed only for peltries or for meat, so there are no chapters devoted to the wholesale slaughter of antelopes and buffalo. Neither is the volume padded out with needless descriptions of trapping and curing operations. In the sixties the Indians were perennially on the warpath, and Bob Norton saw enough of Indian warfare to satisfy even the most ardent. Separated from his comrades, he was captured by the Cheyennes but made his escape in a dramatic manner and falling in with two of General Forsythe's scouts, he remained with them through the battle fought on the Arickaree River. When they were rescued by Custer's troops he was persuaded to enlist temporarily with that command and fought with them at the battle of Wishita where the Cheyenne nation was finally subdued. There are various other adventures, and plenty of hardships to surmount but "The Horsemen of the Plains" has escaped the usual faults of these frontier tales which are, too often, only dime novels legthened out, put into boards and listed at a high price. Bob Norton did not aim at heroism and no one with whom he was associated looked upon him as an infant wonder. He did his duty as it presented itself, performed the task that lay nearest at hand and came through his experience unspoiled. Though the trappers made a sort of pet of him it was in much the same fashion as they petted their horses, expecting them, none the less, to be ready for service, and Bob was the sort of boy who felt more highly complimented by being placed on guard at night and trusted with important duties than he would have been if he had been exempted. Any boy old enough to read alone will appreciate "The Horsemen of the Plains," and the older ones will be doubly appreciative of a story with no girls in it. The adventures are such as boys all crave and the hero acquits himself as every right minded boy likes to believe he would in the same place. Illustrations by Charles Livingstone Bull, are in color. The story is by Joseph A. Altsheler, published by the Macmillan Co.

"Revivals" Catch On

By a curious and instructive coincidence the most successful theatrical performances of the season in New York and London were revivals. In London the play that has made the greatest hit and the most money is Henry Arthur Jones' "Liars," a comedy that was written ten years ago. Of what has happened in New York the Sun has this to say:

"One of New York's foremost theatres is unique in the recent history of local amusements. To this theatre came a popular actor and author to present the plays with which his fame has been associated. There was the intimation that these appearances might be his valedictory, although there was little insistence on that feature of his return to the New York stage in his old pieces. Doubtless there will be no more talk of this kind, since this actor has played to the largest audiences that have greeted any star in New York in years. So great is the desire to see him and his plays that his engagement is to be continued at another theatre. And this success came to an actor appearing in dramas that had been seen time and again by this public. The richly patronized three weeks were devoted to the so-called "revivals" hitherto scorned by the commercial managers. It has long been a principle of our theatre managers that whether a drama be good or indifferent, familiar or unknown, it cannot succeed when it is brought out of its resting place and put on the stage again. None of the plays acted by this author was epoch making in any way. They were all specimens of expert stage-craft, but there was no quality about them to suggest that they might ever be dragged again into the glare of the footlights and made to interest theatre-goers to such a degree as few other plays have in this rather barren season."

"Tea or coffee?" demanded the bustling waitress.

He smiled benignly. "Don't tell me; let me guess," he whispered.

Looking Northeast from Intersection of Corbett Avenue and Dewey Boulevard into the Sutro 724 Acre Tract

Did you ever see Denny Blaine Park at Seattle?

Or Hollywood Park in Los Angeles?

Or Claremont Court near Berkeley?

Did you ever wonder why there wasn't something of the kind in San Francisco? Where a man could buy a lot for $40 or $60 a foot,

And build a pretty little bungalow,

And have good neighbors,

And a lawn and flowers and trees and so forth,

With room enough for a garage and a sleeping porch?

Want to know why there's nothing of that kind here with great winding boulevards and shady nooks and vine covered porches?

Its because we had but one Adolph Sutro, but one man who acted upon his conviction that trees were necessary to turn sandhills into parks and gardens.

Until now these tree covered Sutro lands were unpurchasable—no offer would be considered—they were not for sale.

The home builder looking for $40 and $60 per foot property had his choice between buying a sand hill in San Francisco or going to Alameda, San Mateo or Marin Counties.

There WERE no park lands procurable, because no one but Sutro had planted trees; therefore real estate men could develop no Denny Blaine Parks like they did out of the virgin forest surrounding Seattle, or out of the tree covered tracts of Los Angeles or the oak grown hills of Berkeley.

Adolph Sutro was the only man who foresaw conditions and prepared for them and his heirs were right in holding on to this one piece of undeveloped park land until San Francisco was ready for it.

That's the reason we have nothing in the form of a Residential Park in San Francisco.

But now these Sutro lands are open—the public is ready—the owners are ready—San Francisco is ready.

The proposition is too great to be handled during the time the option runs, by any one real estate concern.

The scheme is of city wide importance and of state wide interest.

And so the owners of the property stipulated that all of the people should have the opportunity to share in the tremendous profits that will accrue in the subdivision of their land.

There are 724 acres in this beautiful tract. These 724 acres are offered THE PUBLIC for $1,418,520.83.

Some of the biggest business men in San Francisco are buying the stock in $25,000, $40,000 and $50,000 lots—others are buying it in $1000, $2000, and $5000 lots.

All are paying the SAME PRICE and the SAME TERMS—no favorites—no "inside"—no rebates—the cash MUST SHOW on the books—where any stockholder may see the record.

It's a clean cut business proposition that ought to return 200 per cent inside of a few years.

Your friends are waiting for a decent place to build,

San Francisco needs a Residential Park.

There's big money in the proposition.

And the RIGHT KIND OF MEN are back of it.

Shares are $100 each—not less than 10 shares to one person. Terms, $10 per share before January 31st and $90 when 9,000 shares have been sold.

It's exactly what you've been looking for, so get in for something even if it's only a thousand dollars.

Not merely do business in the city
But maintain residences within the city
If 500 or 1000 families of means and good taste
Built their homes in the city of San Francisco
Everyone of you would get some of their custom
The more custom the more profit
You agree with that
You can insure it
And the premiums you pay will come back to you multiplied
Maybe five times, maybe seven times
That's the only kind of a premium that does come back

THE WAY TO DO IT

Buy shares of stock in the Residential Development Company of San Francisco
This Company will purchase 724 acres of Sutro Forest Improve it artistically
Make it a delightful restricted residence section Attract wealthy people to build their homes on its terraced hill sides

And these at much higher prices than the Company will pay That's whence your profits on the premiums come
You can't lose
The land is your security
The Company with its excellent Board of Directors
Is sufficient assurance of good management
The opportunity is before you now
You must act with promptness
You must insure your larger trade
And bigger profits now

THE SUBSCRIBERS

This is reasonable Business-like Fair

If it is not Come and point out to us its weakness

If you don't want to invest more than $5000

Our Competing Patriots

The fight against the "interests" and the "system" is growing warmer in all sections of the country. Progressive sentiment is rapidly prevailing everywhere. The indications are that the politicians will soon make it unanimous. And why not? It would be contrary to all experience if the politicians neglected to trim their sails to catch what seemed to be the breeze of popular favor. Now that we are approaching a Presidential campaign competition for public confidence will increase from day to day along with the vehemence of our most vociferous statesmen who will vindicate their consuming passion for the welfare of the dear people with ebullitions of virtuous indignation, spasms of morality and outbursts of self-righteous scorn and hatred. In these tempestuous times of vanity, dissimulation, intrigue and moral cowardice it is decidedly heartening to discern in public life occasional gleams of human virtue, courageous spirit and a decent and regulated sensibility to honest fame and reputation. By such gleams have our senses been gladdened while looking toward the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in the metropolis of which Senator Lodge bade defiance to the demagogic arts of Governor Foss and affirmed his loyalty to principles which our Progressive patriots would have us believe are more abominable than the pomps of Satan.

The Perfumed Burglar

The case of young Repsold, the "perfumed burglar" as he has been dubbed by the dailies, is one that upon investigation might be found to be rich in psychological as well as human interest. The reporters were quick to perceive the obvious, that is, the romantic features of the case, but they gave no heed to a hint they received of the possibility of a store of biographical material being ready to hand for instructive exploitation. Here, according to the newspapers, is a young man, a thief at twenty, the son of a wealthy and respected citizen, thrown into jail, without exciting the solicitude of his father. Indeed the newspapers tell us that the unfortunate wretch appealed to his father in vain. They also tell us that he has a stepmother, and they quote that lady to the effect that his father will have nothing to do with him. The only information we are given of the genesis of this human derelict is that in his teens he was roughing it abroad. Now might it not be more than merely interesting to make inquiry regarding the past of this "perfumed burglar"? Is he an incorrigible, a congenital thief, like Jonathan Wilde or Ferdinand du Fathom, or did untoward circumstance start him on his career of crime? If not in the interest of justice mayhap for the benefit of society the Repsold biography should be ventilated. Who knows but that it may abound in pregnant hints for parents. There is a good deal of truth in the old aphorism that as the twig is bent the tree is inclined. There are parents who though they may realize that boys will be boys forget that boys will also be men, and who wonder why the streams are bitter when they themselves have poisoned the fountain. Now we have no knowledge respecting the training of young Repsold. We would only suggest that if what the newspapers say is true it may be that in spite of his crimes he is not undeserving of compassion and of an effort toward reclamation. On the other hand it may be that he is a hardened criminal at twenty, past redemption, and therefore only of pathological interest; for on no other hypothesis, if on that, can we account for his abandonment by his father. We are told that God sends men children not merely to keep up the race, but to enlarge their hearts, make them unselfish and full of kindly sympathies, and it is not in the hour of a son's downfall, disgrace and distress that we expect to find a father giving proof of the futility of his parenthood.

Our Gilded Philistine

God, we are told, shows his contempt of wealth by the men he bestows it on. This is an observation which seems to find abundant verification in the ridiculous plutocracy of our country. When we see absurdly rich men playing at philanthropy in the limelight of a vast stage in a way that suggests the possibility of their having persuaded themselves that their ill-gotten riches give them the power of altering the scheme of creation we realize how mysterious are the ways of Providence, by what strange methods are exemplified the vanity of that feeble worm of the earth, "the glory and the scandal of the universe." Nevertheless in the case of a man who has acquired excessive wealth like a knave we should not be disposed to rail when we find him trying to spend it like a gentleman. When, however, a multi-millionaire philanthropist, striving to purchase honor with his tainted money, employs it to compel the acquiescence of a whole people in his crotchets and thus make them as ridiculous as himself there is occasion for protest. So in no querulous spirit but out of concern for the public good we would suggestionize public sentiment with a view to having the brakes put on Mr. Andrew Carnegie, the officious Laird of Skibo. According to our conception of the matter Mr. Carnegie with all his multitudinous beneficent intentions, all his fine impulses and aspirations, is doing more harm than good in the world. He is doing harm because he is making sycophants of men who influence public thought. By means of a fund for the pensioning of superannuated college professors he has established himself as a sort of dictator of the educational world. Before him our pedagogues are bending the pregnant hinges of the knee as before some great panjandrum of the temple of erudition, and whatever problem he ventures to solve they are at hand to pay to wealth the tribute of respect that is due to virtue and talent. This sycophancy of our college professors is injurious, not to say disgusting. For Mr. Carnegie is an arrogant Philistine, a presumptuous ignoramus, and his teachings are mischievous. He has begun to talk to us like a pedagogue to his pupil whom he wishes to make as big a blockhead as himself. With the characteristic arrogance of a little learning he affects a knowledge of all things, and in the interest of the people's peace of mind he would solve all problems that come home to the business and bosoms of men. He is a Scotch edition of Mr. Roosevelt; knows all things and would have all things conform to what he would have them to be. There is hardly anything that he hasn't meddled in from forms of belief and systems of philosophy to the mating of plants and the perpetuation of peace. One of his latest projects is the weaning of the national anthem from the misguided affections of his countrymen; but his pet hobby at all times is phonetic spelling, and he has been lately acclaiming the students of a seminary for being deficient in orthography. In this matter as in all others he is taken seriously as though he were a man of letters and knew something of the connection between spelling and literature. The fact is of course that Mr. Carnegie is laboring under the delusion that words are employed chiefly for commercial purposes. Believing himself to be the first phonetic reformer he fancies that by inducing universal acceptance of his gospel he will be celebrated by posterity. If he knew anything of the history of the subject or the history of language he would not be so zealous as to essay a task that was beyond the power of a Roman Emperor, the first phonetic reformer and the author of a book on phonetic spelling. It would doubtless astonish Mr. Carnegie to learn that long before steel was made in Pittsburg learned men discovered many objections to phonetic spelling, among them being the objection that while a consistent orthography would not relieve memory of its grievances it would cause the sacrifice of valuable and important tradition and historical association. And doubtless Mr. Carnegie would hardly understand if he were told that the etymological principle is more important than the phonetic. But the average college professor versed in philology, though he is in no need of instruction on this subject, is saying nothing to enlighten the creator of the Carnegie Foundation. On the contrary he is acquiescing in the vagaries of the arrogant philanthropist and encouraging the spread of philistinism. In the words of another, "The learned pate ducks to the golden fool," and therefore we rise to protest. The intellectual dishonesty that Mr. Carnegie's wealth is producing is much worse than the common, vulgar dishonesty with which our politics and business interests are tainted.

Our New Senator

Addressing the Legislature after his election to the Senate the Hon. John D. Works expressed certain views that give us pause and cause us to wonder how much of sincerity and how much of cant there is in his political philosophy. Thanking the Democratic members for their votes he said it was an encouraging sign of the times that "good men in office are no longer ruled by blind partisanship but are seeking to serve the interests of the people." Obviously Judge Works assumes that every vote for him was prima facie evidence of a desire to serve the people. This may be an honest assumption. It is possible that Judge Works has a very high opinion of himself and not the remotest suspicion of the scandal attending his election. The man in the street may be of the opinion that Judge Works sold his manhood for office, but Judge Works may be firmly convinced that in his case the office sought the man and smothered the conscientious scruples of the public servants who voted for him in violation of a principle and a moral obligation. When a man is convinced that his personal interests and the public interests are identical his judgment is more likely to be swayed by his heart than his head. One can conceive of a man with self-respect and the modesty that accompanies real excellence coupled with genuine sensibility who would feel that an election procured in the circumstances that attended Judge Works' election, would deprive him of all claim to popular respect and brand him as a man of vulgar instincts and weak character, but it must be admitted that there is another viewpoint from which it might be possible to place an entirely different estimate on the whole business. This unquestionably is the viewpoint which Judge Works prefers. As we have said, however, Judge Works has views that gives us pause. He said among other things in his address to the Legislature that to establish our government as a government of the people it was necessary to "exclude from public office any and every man that owes or acknowledges allegiance to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company." This means, if it means anything, that the principle of the sovereignty of the people will be put in jeopardy unless we deprive every man on the pay-roll of the Southern Pacific Company from the president to the humblest switchman of the rights of citizenship. This is a remarkable sentiment only for the reason that it emanated from a lawyer, a man who has served the people in the capacity of justice of the Supreme Court of the State. It was expressed not extemporaneously in the heat of debate, but in the cold blood that is said to be characteristic of Judge Works, and it was read by him from a paper upon which he labored in the privacy of his chamber. If that sentiment had been uttered by an ordinary job-chaser it would hardly call for comment, for at this time the supposition is that the people are in a very vindictive mood, eager to revenge themselves on the octopus, and the average job-chaser is always on the alert to conciliate the people and win their esteem. The average job-chaser, in short, is a contemptible demagogue, the legitimate object of distrust and popular contempt. But when Judge Works uttered himself at Sacramento he had ceased for the moment to be a job-chaser; he had been elected to the job, and there was no necessity of his playing to the gallery. So as we say considering the source it was a most remarkable sentiment.

The Governor's Plan of Action

Governor Johnson has taken the Examiner into his confidence and outlined the course he has resolved upon with reference to the members of the Legislature. We learn that he "will not only scrutinize the acts but also the motives of those who are against him," and that it is his purpose to institute a "Club of Undesirables" to supply the dear people with material for execration. He says: "If you find legislators who are lawyers making wry faces and questioning the constitutionality of proposed measures—measures be it remembered that have been passed upon by every law officer of the State—watch him well, because his opposition on that ground is a pretence and a sham." Not many years ago if the Governor of a State were to assume this attitude toward a co-ordinate branch of the Government he would occasion alarm and be severely censured for what would be pronounced a gross and dangerous impropriety conclusive of a spirit of monarchical despotism impossible of reconciliation with the American idea of democracy. But at this stage of our political development there is nothing of heterodoxy in Governor Johnson's contemplated course of conduct. He has merely decided upon following in the footsteps of the illustrious Rough Rider whose hold on the imagination of his countrymen is but slowly relaxing. Under the Roosevelt dispensation the monarchical idea became exceedingly popular. And this by the way is the singular paradox that marks the history of all democracies—that while the people in complying with the exhortations of the idols of the masses eagerly extend their own powers they gradually drift into the power of one man. The people of this country are today impatient of constitutional restraints and demanding that the legislatures, National and State, representing as they do popular will, be given full power to act, and at the same time they applaud the coercion of their representatives by one tyrannical individual who insists that his judgment must be accepted as final and that all who oppose it must be execrated. Thus history is repeating itself as we may learn by going back several hundred years and listening to a voice from the grave, the voice of Aristotle. Give ear to the Stagyrte while he tells us of the peculiarities by which we may detect the demagogue, and consider how little human nature has changed through the ages:

The court flatterer flourishes under the tyranny of one man; the demagogue under the tyranny of the multitude; and the flatterer and the demagogue are equally solicitors to extend that unlawful domination on which their own influence depends. The demagogue persuades the multitude to disregard the authority and to trample under foot every law of the constitution, that full scope may be given to the authority of occasional decrees, well knowing that while the passions of the multitude govern, he who can best wield those passions must be master of the State. The multitude listen with delight to one who seems to have nothing at heart but to promote their interest or gratify their pleasure; and cheerfully accept his invitation to take the public concerns entirely into their own hands so that every established magistracy and every regular function of political power is enfeebled, suspended, or utterly abolished.

The impudence of demagogues is the ordinary bane of democracies. By private calumny and public impeachment these incendiaries exasperate the poor against the rich and compel the rich through their common fears to unite into an exasperated faction actuated by opposite interests to those of the community at large. The resentment of men of property, provoked by the wickedness of demagogues overturned the democracy of Cos. . . . And it may be regarded as a general theorem in politics that demagogues are the pests of democracies.

The confidence of the multitude was the great engine by which these politicians assailed the freedom of their country; and the pledge of this confidence was their hatred and persecution of opulence and nobility. It was by persecuting the wealthy Pediti that Pisistratus enslaved Athens. Theogenes pursued the same plan at Megara, and there met with similar success. Dionysius, by the impeachment of Daphaneus and other rich men raised himself to the throne of Syracuse. Democracies sink into the lowest degeneracy when the national assembly is persuaded to supplant the authority of laws by the caprice of occasional decrees.

All of which, we submit, is instructive reading in the light of current crusades against the abuses of corporate power as conducted by leaders of the people with a partiality for "private calumny and public impeachment," a distrust of "established magistracy" as evidenced by the proposal to apply the principle of the Recall to the judiciary, and a disposition to "trample under foot every law of the Constitution that full scope may be given to the authority of occasional decrees" of the legislature from which they propose to recruit clubs of undesirables.

Perspective Impressions

Let us have a court-martial to trace the story from the press through a certain club frequented by officers of the navy to the West Virginia.

There is no moralist so aggressive, so uncompromising as he that is skilled in the art of serving God without offending the devil.

The Boughten Bulletin says that "Senator Works can be relied upon always to hold principle above partisanship." Always—except when he's running for a job.

Professor Jaffa of the university says that the short-toed hen, the hen who wears out her toes by constant exercise, is the one that lays the most eggs. Why not give a little credit to the rooster?

Governor Johnson says he "will not only scrutinize the acts but also the motives of those who are against him."—Examiner. The men most skilled in the science of analyzing motives are those most given to introspection.

Rear-Admiral Barry appears to have been guilty of the offense of retarding promotion in the navy by holding his position for five years after the date on which he might have retired.

David Starr Jordan and several other eminent and professional busybodies have signed a protest against fortifying our big ditch. Some men will never learn that because they are entirely occupied with themselves is not sufficient reason for always attempting to occupy the thoughts of others.

Governor Woodrow Wilson of New Jersey is against the "system" and the "interests" and for the election of Senators by direct vote, but nobody questions his intellectual honesty. He is among the few men in office who are with the demagogues but not of them.

Several editors are shocked because some thirteen hundred men in Adams county, Ohio, have come forward and admitted to the Grand Jury that they took money for their votes at the recent election. One ought not to be shocked at this wholesale purchase of votes without knowing by whom the money was paid. In this State at the recent election votes were bought by wholesale on the hoof, but the bargain was made in the interest of a reformer and therefore to advance the greater good, which means that no crime was committed.

Correspondence

You Can't Fool Him

Mr. Town Talk: You evidently think your constant readers are of faint mentality, from the stuff you print. For instance, last week, the silly stories about Gov. Johnson. Too foolish to require denial. Gee, but you work hard to earn your steady retainers! Surely, a lot of the weekly output cannot have the sanction of your own judgment.

—J. J.

(The foregoing is published in violation of a rule which excludes from this department anonymous communications devoted to personal abuse. The exception is made in this instance for two reasons; first, because the abuse is directed against ourselves; secondly, because the letter serves in a measure to illustrate a peculiarity of the average citizen who flatters himself that he is a superior person. It is perhaps unnecessary to say that we do not regard the writer as typical of the class to which Governor Johnson looks for inspiration and encouragement.—Editor Town Talk.)

A Swat from President Wheeler

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: You are familiar with the ins and outs of most occurrences in our parish, so I beg leave to ask you for a little information. I read in today's paper that President Benjamin Ide Wheeler of the University of California, in an address to the Commonwealth Club, had declared that the legal and medical departments of the university, that is to say, the Hastings College of Law and the Medical School, did not "give instruction of a university standard." He amplified this statement by explaining that he found the work of the Hastings College unsatisfactory despite his efforts to raise the standards there; and that he was not proud of the two last years of work at the Medical College.

This I take to be as hard a smash at two of our favorite educational institutions as they have ever received. Now, my constant reading of your weekly has taught me to look for ulterior motives in public happenings; and I am wondering whether there may be more than appears on the surface in this swat. That eminent poet-reformer, Dr. Edward Robeson Taylor, is dean of the faculty of the Hastings College of Law. President Wheeler is also a reformer. Is it possible that there is dissension in the house of reform? Has one reformer no compunction about using the Commonwealth Club as a place to air his differences with another reformer? I appeal to you to tell me: What is the trouble between President Wheeler and Dr. Taylor?

Inquisitively,

Sunday, January 15. —Thos. P. Collins.

A Standard Wanted

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: As I understand it Governor Johnson proposes to give the Railroad Commission supreme power over the transportation companies, and that already he has discovered many rates charged by the Southern Pacific Company which are exorbitant and should be reduced. On the face of it this seems good so far as it goes, but would it not be a good idea to set up some standard by which rates may be made somewhat uniform? I am not versed in the mysteries of transportation, but it occurs to me that notwithstanding differences of grade, of population, of the length of hauls, of commodities, etc., it should be possible to arrive at some kind of principle upon which rates might be adjusted with something of uniformity. Here it seems to me is a problem for constructive statesmanship, the importance of which is obvious. We may have an honest and competent railroad commission at present, one deserving of Governor Johnson's confidence, but a few years from now we may have another kind of commission susceptible to the blandishments of that Octopus which our Governor hates with an abiding hatred, and then the powers of the commission might be employed to discriminate against that good road, the Western Pacific, which the Governor loves with an unselfish and holy passion. We are entering upon a new era in our history and we wish to encourage all railroads, not to harass them as the politicians did in Texas until the people realizing the folly of the business and the injury that was being done the State, began holding indignation meetings to abate the zeal of their statesmen. There is nothing to be gained by crippling any railroad or by discouraging the enterprise of capital, and the people should therefore have some means of determining whether any railroad is receiving less than a square deal. Our politicians are telling us that their purpose is to drive the Octopus out of politics, but you and I know that the Octopus can never afford to keep out of politics while the politicians are in a position to cinch it every time it appears to be reluctant to come through. As desirable as it may be to keep "Honest Hiram" in office always so that the Octopus shall never be able to corrupt the Executive the probability is that some day he will have a weak successor, and therefore we should seek to have the railroads disciplined rather by principle than by man.

Very truly yours,

—William L. Slater

San Jose, January 16.

Table Talk

"Let's see," observed the smart boarder seating himself at table, "how is it the proverb runs—" "You refer to the saying that one man's meat is another man's hash," put in one. "Or," said another, "don't cry over skimmed milk." "Or, possibly," said a third, "in butter there is strength." "No," returned the smart boarder, "the particular proverb I had in mind is: None but the brave can face the fare."

V—WILL L. GREENBAUM

By Edward F. O'Day

Perhaps you have never met Greenbaum. Perhaps your knowledge of him is derived solely from reading in the theatrical advertisements, "Will L. Greenbaum presents" this, that or the other world-famous star. In that event Greenbaum is nothing to you but a presenter, an impresario, an entrepreneur. You think of him vaguely, if you have time to think of him at all, as the man in the box office or the man behind the scenes. His personality does not count; his name does not matter; whether or not his presentations are financially successful is a thing of supreme indifference. Will L. Greenbaum might just as well be Michael J. Rafferty or Fritz Katzenjammer.

But if you have met Greenbaum, there is no longer of your feeling indifferent. You are bound to be interested. He draws you irresistibly, not so much by his personality in the first instance, but by his knowledge and experience. For Will Greenbaum is a man of high musical cultivation. Music has no secrets for him. He has pursued harmony to her most silent recesses and has plucked the heart out of counterpoint. His brain is a storehouse of musical compositions which he plays like an artist and which no artist can play in his hearing and hope to go undetected for a slurred note or a misinterpreted passage. He knows more operas, more symphonies, more concertos than any amateur in San Francisco. As far as the literature of music is concerned, he is a veritable walking edition of Grove—and can tell you many an interesting story that has never been embalmed in those classical pages. Further than that he knows all the musicians. There isn't a great artist in the world whom he cannot call by his or her first name, if he wants to—and generally he doesn't want to. They all call him "Will." Why shouldn't they? He has brought them all to San Francisco for the enhancement of their reputation and the fattening of their bank accounts.

Knowing these things about Will Greenbaum, you naturally attribute to him a world experience. You do not have to hear the details of his life. In your mind's eye you can see him studying, an earnest hard-working student, in Milan or Berlin or Hamburg or Leipzig or Paris—it matters not just where. You can see him steeping his soul in the beauty of the old world. You picture him haunting the great opera houses of Latin and Teutonic civilization, mingling with the impresarios of a dozen capitals and learning their ways of losing and making money. Perhaps you wonder how he ever came to restrict his large talents to this small town of ours at the pylon of occidental advancement. You speculate as to the likelihood of his some day tiring of our provincialism and leaving us to the mercy of the lyceum managers and the Chautauquans.

In the midst of such speculations it will probably surprise you to learn that Will Greenbaum was born in Sacramento; it will doubtless amaze you to hear that he was educated in the public schools of this city; and ten chances to one it will shock you to discover that he has only been outside of California for a single day. Yet it's all true. Will Greenbaum is one of the most faithful native sons, one of the most persistent stay-at-homes we have. Instead of going to the great artists of the world he makes them come to him; which, when you come to think it over, isn't a bad plan, particularly when it is mutually profitable, as it sometimes is.

Will Louis Greenbaum was born in the town of Sacramento in 1866. If you should take the trouble to look up the scene of this auspicious event, as Greenbaum did when he was last in Sacramento, you would find that the place of his nativity is a five-cent tamale factory directly opposite the Sacramento jail. Right here we might inject a little moralizing on that sad old time-worn theme, How times have changed. For at the time when Will Greenbaum drew his first breath, the tamale factory was quite an imposing residence and the building across the street was the State Capitol. But the State's army of tax-eaters is now housed in a more impressive structure and where the laws were once made, mended and unmade the law is now enforced on the casual drunk or the heedless vag. And a similar deterioration has been the lot of the old Greenbaum home. Where Will's first baby cries penetrated from room to room the sea gull masquerading as chicken is stuffed into a conglomerate mass of Indian corn and red pepper and wrapped in a coat of shucks. The hot tamale steams where Will Greenbaum was wet-nursed. But enough of these melancholy reflections.

Greenbaum's father was a pioneer who had journeyed to Sacramento from New Orleans by way of the Isthmus of Panama. He was a stock broker and when his hopeful was six weeks old he moved to San Francisco. Greenbaum has been here ever since. When he was old enough to go to school he was sent to the Lincoln Primary and continued on through the Lincoln Grammar. There were great men—as we San Franciscans reckon our great men—at the Lincoln School; among them David Belasco who insists in all his Who's Who biographies on calling it "Lincoln College." Will Greenbaum is incapable of such affectation. Afterwards Greenbaum went to the Boys' High, more recently the Lowell High. And when he had graduated from high school he was through with teachers, although his education was just beginning.

Not through with all teachers, come to think of it. There was still his musical instructor. He took lessons on the piano from Gustav Hinrichs who was the leader of the Tivoli orchestra and who was to have an important influence on his future career. He mastered also the violin and the cornet; and at the time when Dick Tobin was playing first violin and Denis O'Sullivan was playing viola in the St. Ignatius Orchestra, Will Greenbaum was playing cornet in the same organization.

Greenbaum was an amateur musician; he did not work at it. He had quite a big business of his own. When he finished high school his father bought him a perfume factory and he went heart and soul into the fragrant occupation of manufacturing sweet smells. Greenbaum's perfumes and perfumed soaps were very well known in this city a few years ago—up to the time of the great disaster, in fact. It was a paying business until the drug stores became his rivals and then there was not much money in it. But that was not a matter of great import to Greenbaum, for he never was and never will be a money grubber.

He had been taking lessons in music from Hinrichs for fifteen years when that artist left San Francisco. Twelve years ago Hinrichs returned to conduct the first season of Italian grand opera at the old Tivoli. He was glad to see his old pupil and his old pupil reciprocated and arranged a series of symphony concerts. They were known as the Hinrichs-Beel concerts and were given at the Baldwin. The San Francisco Symphony Society with Hinrichs as its first and Fritz Scheel as its second conductor, grew out of them. Greenbaum arranged for the soloists of every concert—and that was the way he became an impresario. At the Baldwin he met Alfred Bouvier and together they brought to this city the Ellis Opera Company with Melba as the star. Then they brought out Nordica and Mascagni—a great event for San Francisco was the coming of Mascagni—and Kocian who is again with us now, and many others. Then Bouvier died, universally mourned, and Greenbaum embarked in the business alone. By day he made the city fragrant with perfume and by night he made it fragrant with music. It was a pleasant conjunction and may account in part for Greenbaum's cheerful disposition.

It would be useless to catalogue the artists whom Greenbaum has introduced to San Francisco. No individual has done so much for the musical education of the city. Schumann-Heink, Sembrich, the Conreid Opera Company, the Damosch Symphony Orchestra, Paderewski, Kreisler, Ysaye, Bispham are a few of the tidbits that he has placed before the music lovers of this city. And he has not confined himself to musicians. He gave us Ben Greet and his queer Shakespearean productions, not to mention his "Everyman;" Holmes and his travel lectures, the Russian dancers, Maud Allen. A list of the Greenbaum programs is the syllabus of a liberal education.

Many of us may think that a man who knows only California cannot be liberally educated. Will Greenbaum who went out of the State just once and stayed a day in Portland, Oregon, is a vital disproof of this contention. He has never seen the Rue de l'Opera or Covent Garden or Broad-

Starting an Exotic School

For the American champions of Francisco Ferrer, frequently styled a "Martyr to Spanish Progress," there is little cheer in the editorial comment of the New York Times on the recently established Ferrer School of New York. Says the Times: "We can readily understand why Emma Goldman, Alexander Berkman, Bolton Hall, Charles Edward Russell, and other pronounced Anarchists and Socialists should have attended the meeting on the east side Thursday night they organized the 'first Francisco Ferrer School in America.' But we can hardly conjecture why Mr. Bayard Boyesen, himself an instructor in Columbia University, the son of Hjalmar Hjorth Boyesen, possessing all the advantages of education and enlightenment, should have been present, countenanced the purpose of the meeting, and actually helped the organizers of the school, in which he is expected to teach. Francisco Ferrer's schools in Spain were primarily and avowedly schools of revolutionists. In Spain and in other parts of Europe, from which this city's east side draws its population, the cruel and oppressive governmental and social regime explains, if it does not justify, the existence of Socialists, Anarchists, Rationalists, Libertarians, and all manner of radicals, who have been born into conditions of protest and rebellion. The people of this country do not feel that they are born into such conditions. In Spain every considerable city is a camp of revolution suppressed by the military. In this country, too, there is plenty of radicalism, but its speech betrayeth it. It is the radicalism of Europe, radicalism imported with the manners, customs, and habit of thought of our diverse foreign population. There are not enough Americans of native parents in this city, or in any city, to swell the roll of a single Ferrer school. The school that has just been started is exotic. The associations of the Black Hand are exotic. Both are mischievous."

New York's Reading Public

What, in the opinion of the librarian in charge of a branch of the New York Public Library, is a world's record was achieved by the circulation department of the library. During the year ended December 31, 7,500,000 books were distributed to 1,500,000 borrowers in the Public Library's branches of three boroughs. The gain for the year was 500,000. The librarian is sure that no other American city will approach this record and that nowhere in Europe will it be duplicated. "Then you would consider New Yorkers a better class of readers than the people of Boston?" was asked by a reporter. "I certainly would," was the librarian's reply, "even as to the east siders. There were 400,000 books in foreign languages loaned, which was a gain of 50,000 on last year." For writers of novels there was one sad bit of information in the year's totals. Fiction, while still ahead in popularity, lost greatly in its lead over books of a historical and scientific nature.

Three Cruisers Out of Date

A question has arisen as to the disposition of the cruisers Charleston, St. Louis, and Milwaukee, now lying at Puget Sound yard. These ships are of recent date, the St. Louis having been launched five years ago, but unfortunately they are "unarmored protected cruisers," and that type of ship is now desired only for scout ships. A scout ship should have not less than 26-knot speed, but these cruisers are rated as 22-knot ships. If they are to be kept in commission they must undergo expensive repairs, yet they could not be condemned and sold under existing law, because these repairs would not exceed in cost the 10 per cent fixed in the law as a line of condemnation. To sell any vessels not subject to this provision would require the special authorization of Congress, and it is doubtful if this could be obtained in view of the small price realized for the Detroit and the low bids for the Boston. That such fine ships are in this plight so soon after building is in itself a clear commentary on the shortsightedness of the designing officers of the navy and the board that recommended them.

The Microbe's Serenade

At the recent New Theater banquet in New York George Ade, Indiana's most successful son (successful financially), recited a jingle which he called "The Microbe's Serenade." In the interests of science it is worth preservation. It runs thus:

THE MICROBE'S SERENADE

A lovelorn microbe met by chance
At a swagger bacteroidal dance
A proud bacillian belle, and she Was first of the animalculae,
Of organism saccharine,
She was the protoplasmic queen.
The microscopical pride and pet
Of the biological smartest set,
And so this infinitesimal swain
Evolved a pleading low refrain:
"O lovely metamorphic germ,
What futile scientific term
Can well describe your many charms?
Come to these embryonic arms
Then hie away to my cellular home
And be my little diatom!"
His epithelium burned with love,
He swore by molecules above
She'd be his own gregarious mate,
Or else he would disintegrate.
This amorous mite of a parasite
Pursued the germ both day and night
And 'neath her window often played This Darwin-Huxley serenade—
He'd warble to her every day
This rhizopodical roundelay:
"O most primordial type of spore,
I never met your like before,
And though a microbe has no heart,
From you, sweet germ, I'll never part.
We'll sit beneath some fungus growth Till dissolution claims us both!"

Frank Jordan, Reformer

The clever editorial writer of the Sacramento Union has discovered that Secretary of State Frank Jordan is a reformer. This is a welcome bit of news, for all the other tax-eaters at Sacramento are reformers and if Frank Jordan insisted on remaining a performer he would be a jarring instrument in the symphony of reform which is just now being rendered at the capital

Frank's reforms, however, are of a more practical nature than those of most of his brother loafers. I quote from the Union:

"The moment he entered the capitol a few weeks ago, his sense of the artistic was deeply offended when he noticed some dust on the heroic figures of Queen Isabella and Christopher Columbus which stand in the main rotunda under the dome. Particularly grimy were their faces, he thought, so he quietly resolved that the so-called reign of Spain and discoverer of America should be given a bath. Then he walked toward the office he was soon to occupy. As he started to enter he reached and looked for the door-knob. Instantly he stepped back; the soul of the artist chilled again. That brass door-knob did not shine. Some bourgeois janitor had allowed it to lose its luster. Frank was horrified, and so was 'Happy' Dougherty, who walked beside him and as keenly noted the lack of those little touches that make for beauty. That experience made Frank a 'reformer' and made a cake of soap the symbol of reform."

Shima, the King of Spuds

George Shima, the Japanese who raises potatoe toes in the delta region of the San Joaquin, has cleared $200,000 on his latest crop. He farms 4,000 acres and harvested nearly half a million bags of the tubers. Of course Stockton is proud of him. So when the Oakland Tribune called attention to the fact that Shima lives in Berkeley the Stockton Mail was a bit "peevish." It resented the suggestion that he should be called the "Potato King of California," much preferring the purposes of advertisement that he should be designated the "Stockton Potato King." If he is not to be called by the latter appellation, the Mail editor who is something of a classical scholar insists that he be dubbed "Rex Orientalis et Occidentalis Orbis Terrarum in Imperio Spuduum," which being interpreted means "King of the Whole World, East and West, in the Domain of Potatoes." Let it go at that.

Bertillon Vindicated

About a week ago a man was arraigned in London, England, police court on a misdemeanor charge, but was acquitted when he produced evidence apparently showing that fingerprints the police alleged were his, taken upon the occasion of a previous conviction, could not be his as he was serving in the army at the time. This, it was said, was the first time that identification by means of fingerprints failed. Now the accuracy of the method has been vindicated. It has been discovered that the prisoner was never a soldier. He stole the proofs of another's army service. New evidence has been obtained substantiating the police charge that he had previously been sentenced on another charge.

A Social Success

By Marcel Prevost (From the French)

When she kissed me good night last Monday evening mamma said, in the severe tone she reserves for communications on the subject of my matrimonial prospects: "Juliette, my dear, two of those gentlemen will dine with us on Thursday; consider the matter settled. You know what is expected of you."

I considered the matter settled, of course; but mamma was mistaken on one point—I did not know what was expected of me. What is expected—between a Monday and a Thursday—of a girl who is to be trotted out for the inspection of two possible suitors? One cannot tell either one's figure or one's face; there is no time to learn another modern language, one of these famous modern languages which, according to mamma, exert so potent an influence over marriageable men. Not even time enough to get a new frock! So I have decided to present to Thursday's gentlemen Monday's Juliette, with her same little pink and white phiz, her same little five-feet-two stature, and her two poor little modern languages, which she manages to wrestle with, after a fashion.

As to the gentlemen, I have strong suspicion who they are, though mamma does not mention names; she fears some premature objection on my part. I usually come down so hard beforehand upon mamma's candidates that she loses courage and does not dare to put them on exhibition. She says these are "charming men"—charming, that's always the word—"much too good for such a feather-brain as you."

One of them is "not in his first youth," but the other is "not yet thirty."

Mamma has an adorable way of expressing herself; she lumps the aspirants for my hand, the good qualities of one making up for the defects of another. Can she want me to marry the whole bunch, I wonder?

I get more information from papa. I can get anything out of papa by taking a walk with him in the Champs Elysees, or on the boulevards about five in the afternoon. I go along, clinging to his arm confidently, with my big gray eyes fixed on his white beard as if in adoration. Passers-by nudge each other, and papa throws back his shoulders and puffs out his chest. How pleased he is!

If I were not honorable, I could get my allowance doubled and buy all the diamonds in the top windows.

It was after one of these walks that I tackled the poor old dear on the subject of the two sharpshooters who are to open fire upon his lovely daughter Thursday next.

He stiffened up at once. "They are charming fellows," he says, "much too good for a—"

"Feather-brain like me? Of course. Oh, why will you let mamma stuff you so?—you, who are so clear-sighted! It's a shame!" Nothing aggravates papa like an allusion to mamma's influence over him.

"Stuff me? Stuff me? I cannot permit you to stuff your mother stuffs me. One glance at a man is enough for me to know—The duke used to say—papa served as prefect under the Empire—'Givernay? There's an eye for you—and a list!' Did you know that, little one?"

"Trust me for knowing it! I have heard the duke quoted ever since I was born, and when I first began to talk I never said 'pa-pa,' without adding instantly, 'eye—wist—'"

"Know it, papa? Why, of course, and I agree with the duke! That's just why I want you to help me a little—benefit of your experience, you know. How can I be expected to have any knowledge of men? Suppose I fall a prey to both of them next Thursday?"

Plainly, this complication had not been foreseen. Yet, why not, to be sure? Suppose I did fall in love with both; the one "not in his first youth" and the one "not yet thirty" Papa goggled the eye celebrated by Morny and looked rather overcome, poor dear!

Such larks!

"Both gentlemen," said he at last, "are, most assuredly, well calculated to take a woman's fancy. One of them is better known to me than the other, and I am therefore better able to pronounce an opinion upon him. De Nivert and I served together under the Empire. He is forty years of age, a gallant gentleman, in the prime of life—"

"What does he do?"

Papa wrinkles his brow, makes a great mental effort to discover what Monsieur de Nivert can possibly be said to do, and announces, with a rather crestfallen air:

"I scarcely think—he—ah—does anything!" And, immediately, he falls back on mamma's tactics, lovers in the lump.

"But then, on the other hand," says he, "the other one is a young man with a future before him—councillor of the exchequer, and not thirty! It's magnificent! Gaston Salandier will go far, be made prime minister, possibly—and a handsome fellow, too!"

Poor Monsieur de Nivert! It seems, on the whole, that all his best qualities are possessed by Monsieur Salandier. This escheatage begins to arouse my sympathy.

"But," said I, after a moment's reflection, "I had an idea that mamma had been hesitating between four possible matches for me, not just two."

Papa smiled.

"Yes, but after careful deliberation we concluded that only two of the candidates were worthy of the prettiest young person in Paris. For," he adds, kissing me, "you are, really, the prettiest little girl in Paris."

Poor papa! How I wish I could have a husband just like him! And to think how mamma does bullyrag him!

The gist of the matter is, then, that Fate has in reserve for me Hobson's choice: I am to become the wife of either a serious-minded young man or of a far-from-serious-minded old man.

I am trying to remember. No, I have never seen even a picture of the brilliant councillor of the exchequer and possible prime minister. But it does seem to me that I had a glimpse of Monsieur de Nivert at one of the assembly balls. He did not have a great deal of hair, I think, but on the other hand, as mamma would say, he did have a nice little round stomach; oh, quite a little one! Yes, on the whole, he arouses no positive repugnance within me. The baron, if I remember aright, is very well groomed, very chic.

Well, the die is cast—a good-for-nothing nobleman or a plebeian with a future! Gentlemen, which one of you is to wed—in January—Mlle. Juliette Givernay?

II.

It's over! The presentation took place yesterday evening! I must make a note of that memorable dinner by way of diversion for my old age.

Well, yesterday evening, after my maid had brought me the information that our guests were all assembled, I proceeded to make my entrance into the drawing-room. Entering a room is my strong point; it may be said, I think, that I rarely make a failure in that line. I walk straight into the room with my eyes level, raised just high enough to strike a point directly above any other eyes that may be fixed upon me—I neither see nor wish to see any such. For my target I choose some old woman huddled in an armchair, some contemporary of papa's or else mamma herself. Instantly—I never knew it to fail—all conversation ceases, every eye is bent upon me.

Now, I leave it to you, isn't that an accomplishment worth possessing? And isn't it a crying shame to throw it away on this little corner of the world?

The guests, outside of mamma, papa, myself and the aspirants, consisted of the Comte and Comtesse d'Aube—nobility of the Empire—whose years, taken together, amount to one hundred and fifty—a weariness to the flesh, but good souls; and Madame Salandier, the mother of the young councillor of the exchequer, a good bourgeoisie, with a bulging forehead, round eyes, a toilet in which were combined simplicity and the ridiculous, and looking like a fish out of water in our social circle.

At dinner Monsieur de Nivert sat at mamma's right hand and Monsieur Salandier at the left. I was between Madame Salandier and Monsieur de Nivert. Madame Salandier opened the conversation at once with an insinuating, half-patronizing manner that set my teeth on edge. She did nothing but laud to the skies the good qualities of the councillor, whom she elegantly alluded to as "Son." "Son always goes to bed every night at ten o'clock," it seems. She gave me pretty plain hints as to what she should expect of a future daughter-in-law: "A serious deportment, economy, love of home, with a ball or an evening at the theater occasionally, of course. That is expected of a man in Son's position!" Meanwhile "Son," very much at his ease, giving his mustache a conquering twirl every now and then—he really is a handsome fellow—discoursed on the abolition of overtaxation. Papa, mamma, Monsieur d'Aube, Mademoiselle Espalier, and even old Mother d'Aube, who is as deaf as a post, hung open-mouthed upon his words, while Madame Salandier gurgled: "Just hear him! There is not a cabinet minister who knows as much as he does!"

I turned my eyes in the direction of Monsieur de Nivert; he met my look with an answering glance of discreet irony. All at once we seemed to understand one another—two fellow-outcasts among barbarians.

One cannot call him handsome, this Monsieur de Nivert, but it is surprising how entirely he outshone his rival by the simple process of not saying a word about the abolition of overtaxation. As he poured out my wine he murmured a well-turned compliment on my gown, touching upon the very things about it that were a little out of the ordinary and worth admiring, and we fell to talking "chiffons" in a low voice, while "Son" went maundering on with his mathematical calculations.

The Garden of Dreams

By Elwyn Hoffman

One time (it seems like an age ago—the years are so long to me!)
I knew a Garden of Tender Dreams in the city beside the sea.
'Twas just a step from the busy street where the traffic roared so loud,
And all day long there were hurrying feet and the jostling of a crowd;
'Twas just a step—yet once within, with the gate shut close behind,
The Garden lay like a tiny world, with rest for heart and mind;
With shaded paths and perfumed bowers, and a peace so full and sweet
That never an echo entered there from the clamorous, noisy street.

A Golden mist o'er the Garden lay, and out of the mist was wrought
A Vision shaped of a poet's dream and garbed of a poet's thought,
A spirit bright with the higher light and warm with the purer fire, Bearing the gift of the Kindly Word and the torch of the Soul's Desire!
And there, away from the cankered street with its jeers and its cruel stings,
The Vision laid on my hungry heart its touch of the finer things,
And lit the lamps that had guttered out, and sped to its old pursuit Beauty, the light and the lure of Life, the flower and the perfect fruit!

Then came the dawn of a demon's day when the city rocked and fell,
And belching flames roared heavenward and wrought a rage of hell,
The Garden's wall came crashing down in the grasp of that greedy lust,
And its quiet fled on the wings of hate, and its bowers turned into dust.
And all that it held of sacred things, with my soul that was interlaced, Became black char and bitter ash in a world of wreck and waste!

They have builded the city high once more—temple and spire and shaft;
They have given it back the queenly pride at which the earthquake laughed;
Its street tide runs with a louder roar in canyons higher walled,
And its deep voice calls to the greater world as never its old voice called.
Its children boast of the work they've done—but an empty boast it seems
To the heart of me, and the soul of me, for lost is the Garden of Dreams,
And lost is the Vision that made it fair—the queen of its world and mine—
For the Past has drunk its sweetness up as the earth drinks poured-out wine!

Clang of the trolleys, rattle of trucks, and tramp of a thousand feet—
O proud is the pageantry of Today that Blazons O'Farrell Street!
Yet I look and long for a Garden's wall and a gate that opens in—
But never a Garden is there to find, and never a gate to win.
And this is the greatest loss of all, whatever the flames laid waste,
However we build, or strong or tall, whatever may be replaced—
That deep in our souls is a great regret and a grief that naught redeems.
For a Vision lost in the wreck of things, and a vanished Garden of Dreams.

The Spectator

The Navy Scandal

How much of truth or falsehood there may be in the accusations that have been made against Rear-Admiral Barry is a question that I do not care to discuss. The question is one absolutely and exclusively of pathological and scientific interest, and to treat it as a moral question is to be guilty of a vulgar and odious error. Whatever be the facts Rear-Admiral Barry has the sympathy of all pure-minded and generous-hearted men. A terrible tragedy has come into his life at the close of a long and brilliant career in the navy of his country, and nobody of normal sensibility can ponder it without experiencing a severe strain upon his emotions. How affecting the figure he presents to the mind's eye! But yesterday a man of rank, clothed in the majesty of high station, his word of behest to be ignored at no small peril; today, blown by a breath into an abyss of shame and humiliation, wanting a hand to lead him in the darkness, a voice to whisper comfort in his misery. And yet this man, so far as I know, never wronged anybody. Nobody, so far as I know, ever accused him of perfidy or ingratitude, or of any of the meanesses by which men rise to affluence and prestige. He has done his duty in the service of his country for more than forty years, and the worst thing that can be said about him is that he has come to suffer from an affliction as well recognized in the domain of medicine as tuberculosis. And this, as I understand it, is said about him by men who peeked through a key-hole or over a transom, and therefore I do not believe them.

The Honor of the Navy

It is difficult to determine whether this navy scandal appeals more to one's sense of indignation than to one's feeling of pity; whether indignation at the inhumanity and brutality from which Rear-Admiral Barry has suffered exceeds the pity excited by the ordeal through which he passed in the last act of his official career and by the tremendous sorrow that sears his soul. The subject is a most painful one to write about, but there are some ugly features of this scandal that should not be permitted to pass without comment. The daily newspapers have treated the subject as though it involved nothing but the question of Rear-Admiral Barry's guilt or innocence. They have given no thought to the conduct of Rear-Admiral Barry's brother officers, the men who are represented to be very jealous of the honor of the navy, and who have behaved toward their chief rather in the spirit of a Pharisee than that of the biblical Samaritan. Now the honor of the navy cannot possibly suffer through the frailty of any individual. The honor of the navy depends on the ability of its officers and men to maintain respect for it by exhibiting those qualities which enlightened people expect them to exhibit and to which they should never prove false. The officers of the navy are not expected to spy on one of their number, nor are they expected when one of their number seems to have besmirched his own honor to contribute to his embarrassment and disgrace by a course of conduct conducive to gossip and scandal. I am not charging Rear-Admiral Barry's brother officers with being guilty of these things. But the daily newspapers have given the impression that they are guilty and furthermore that they are insensible of what their conduct implies.

Man's Inhumanity to Man

Some men are so weak that they fear they will be suspected of not loathing that which should be loathed unless they give varied and frequent manifestation of their feeling. Not satisfied with their own conscience as witness they summon the whole world to take notice. This appears to be what the officers of the Pacific Squadron with one exception—Captain Orchard—have done. And therefore they seem to be lacking in that true gentility of character the best proof of which is the sympathy it shows for suffering and distress. True gentility accompanied by true goodness is so humble and charitable that it tries not to see what stares it in the face. It has no eager eye for the errors and infirmities of humankind. In its eagerness to solace, heal and raise it triumphs over its own pulsions. From what I have read in the dailies I have received the impression that the officers of the West Virginia behaved toward Rear-Admiral Barry as though hardness of heart, the thing that makes countless thousands mourn, is one of the characteristics of the navy. When Rear-Admiral Barry, after more than forty years' service in the navy was leaving his ship for the last time, with what little expense might the officers of that ship have scattered the consoling seeds of courtesy! Yet was there a man among them that shed a tear for pity? We are told that Rear-Admiral Barry was not rowed ashore in his gig by the commanding officers as is the tradition of the navy. But happily for the honor of the navy and hearts aboard that ship were not unsunned by human kindness. As the man with the crown of sorrow started for shore the tars swarmed over the superstructure of the battleship and climbed to the fighting top to cheer him.

The Loyal Captain

In such a sombre, melancholy drama as that which was enacted aboard the West Virginia an isolated instance of pity, forbearance, generous interpretation—the things that man really owes to man—has the effect of a galvanic shock, producing an exhilarating reaction and relieving the strain on pent-up feelings. The hero of such an instance was Captain Orchard, the one officer of the squadron who attained the lofty peak of magnanimity by an exhibition of greatness of soul. It occurred in Rear-Admiral Barry's cabin in the presence of a reporter, who, I am sorry to say, seems to have taken a perverse pleasure in depicting the anguish of a tortured mind if not in pressing down the crown of thorns upon a bleeding brow. Captain Orchard entered in the midst of the proceedings.

"Captain Orchard," said the reporter, "can you give a decided expression of loyalty and belief in Admiral Barry?"

According to the reporter, like a shot from one of his own guns came the answer:

"Yes, sir, I can and do express loyalty—loyalty to my Admiral." And at the same time he thrust out his hand which Admiral Barry took and shook with emotion saying: "God bless you for that, Orchard, God bless you for that." But the reporter was not satisfied. He tells us that Captain Orchard expressed "not a word of belief." This reporter evidently is a shrewd, sceptical individual, not easily imposed upon. His judgment, however, it may be worth recording, does not coincide with that of Ben Allen of the Associated Press who made a thorough investigation of the whole matter and believes in Admiral Barry. How much better the world would be if we all felt that the judgment we pass on men ought to be influenced by generosity and qualified by considerations of age and past deeds? When so influenced and qualified judgment is generally the least unjust.

De Profundis

In one of the daily papers it was reported that on Sunday when Rear-Admiral Barry was returning to his ship from mass he encountered some sailors at the ferry who behaved when they saw him with great levity and in a most insulting manner. In this connection it may be interesting to read at this time an excerpt from De Profundis wherein the author describes a somewhat similar experience: "From 2 o'clock until half-past two I was forced to stand on the middle platform at Clapham Junction, handcuffed and in the prisoner's garb, exposed to the gaze of the crowd. Of all the outcasts, I, no doubt, was the most grotesque to look at. The people laughed when they saw me. Every train that arrived increased the curious crowd of spectators. Their mirth was boundless. This was quite natural before they knew who I was. But when they learned it they laughed still more. There I stood for half an hour in the grey November rain, surrounded by a howling mob. For a whole year afterward I wept bitterly every day at the same hour. This is not as tragic as it probably sounds to you. To shed tears is part of the daily routine of those who are behind prison-bars. A day in prison when one does not weep is a day when one's heart grows harder, not a day when one's heart is happy. Now I feel sorry for the people who laughed at me then more than I pity myself. When they saw me I was not on a pedestal but at the pillory. Wholly unimaginative beings care only for people posing on a pedestal. But a pedestal may be a very unreal thing; the pillory, however, is a horrible reality."

Kate—These new photographs of yours remind me of Jack.

Alice—Of Jack! For mercy sake where's the resemblance?

Kate—They flatter you so, dear.

California's Greatest Organizer

With the coalition of the financial forces of Francis M. Smith of Oakland and Will S. Tevis of this city in the two hundred million dollar corporation known as the United Properties Company, the personality of Robert G. Hanford of New York and San Francisco takes on an importance which it has never seemed to possess before. There are financiers of experience in this State who declare that Robert G. Hanford is the greatest organizer that California has ever known. And yet he is a comparatively unknown man. A member of exclusive clubs, his face is not a familiar one to our most persistent clubmen; fond of society, he is a stranger to most of our social personages; the swinger of mighty moneyed deals, there are not half a dozen newspapermen in town who recognize him when they pass him in the hotel lobbies. Although Hanford has been identified with California enterprises for fifteen years and has spent a great part of that period in San Francisco, he can hardly be considered "one of us" in the ordinary sense. We are not on nodding terms with him; we are not accustomed to seeing his picture in the papers; he doesn't lend his moral support to public movements; to most of us he is "nomen et praeterea nihil," if my learning may expect forgiveness.

"Who Is R. G. Hanford?"

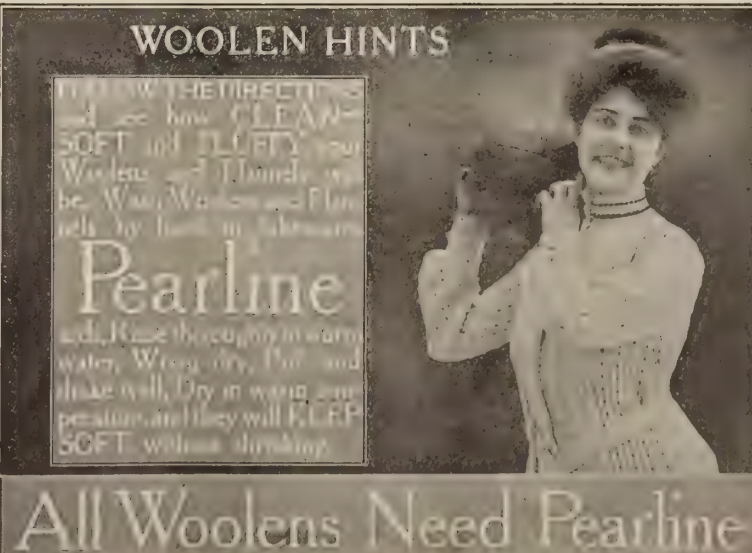

In July, 1909, the city was treated to quite a sensation. Mrs. Lorena de la Montanya, the divorced wife of the Marquis James de la Montanya and known to newspaper readers as the heroine of several lurid episodes, died by her own hand in her Jones street apartment. When the authorities arrived they found a woman friend by her side and a physician striving vainly to keep her alive. At first mystery surrounded the sudden death, but it did not take long to clear it up. It was found that there had been a dinner party of four in the apartment, Mrs. de la Montanya, a Mrs. Patton, Charles O. Whittemore of Los Angeles, vice-president of the Las Vegas and Tonopah Railroad, and Robert G. Hanford. Then it came out that in the course of the evening Robert G. Hanford had taken from his pocket a small German automatic revolver which interfered with his movements in mixing an "Irish sour," that he had warned Mrs. de la Montanya against touching the weapon and that while his back was turned she had picked it up. Whether it went off accidentally or whether she discharged it purposely was never made clear, but the bullet killed her. Because the two men fled from the scene before the authorities arrived and because Coroner Leland had been notified but delayed taking official action, the mystery of the fatality was accentuated and for several days it was the talk of the town. One of the questions everybody asked was, "Who is R. G. Hanford?" Even the city editors of the newspapers had to ask it. The man was practically unknown.

Some of His Achievements

And yet Robert G. Hanford is the man who gathered the various street railroads of this city together and consolidated them into what is now known as the United Railroads. He is the man who organized the Natomas Consolidated of California, the wonderful corporation which has mended a number of broken fortunes and helped to give the State a new crop of millionaires. He is the man who helped Will S. Tevis gather up the various water supplies in the vicinity of San Francisco Bay. And he is the man who has crowned his other achievements by building a two hundred million dollar corporation that is today the talk of the bourses of the world. He is the man of whom Will S. Tevis, a giant of finance, has said: "He will make more money for me in the next ten years than I have been able to make in all my life." Decidedly Robert G. Hanford is a personage who ought to be better known.

He Knows Dredge-Mining

R. G. Hanford came to California from Idaho fifteen years ago. He had been engaged in gold mining, dredging processes being his specialty. He began investigating the dredging possibilities of the rich soil of the Sacramento Valley and perfecting machines adapted to the physical conditions. Not much was heard of him, for Hanford works very quietly. But one day in 1901 he dropped into San Francisco and acquired the San Mateo electric line. Then he got control of the Sutter Street Railway; and finally he absorbed the Market Street system. In November, 1901, with the assistance of Tiley L. Ford he sold the street railways of San Francisco to the Baltimore syndicate which sent Patrick Calhoun out here to take charge. It was a cash transaction involving $26,000,000 and at the time it was said to be the most colossal purchase ever made in this country. But Hanford did not stay in the limelight. He went back very quietly to his dredging projects, concentrating his attention on the Feather and American River lands. Then one day we learned of the organization of Natomas Consolidated and with some surprise read the purpose of the corporation and the names of the stockholders. It was going to reclaim 55,000 acres of land, dredge 5,700 acres for gold, supply Sacramento with pure drinking water and carry out a colonization scheme. There were big men in Natomas—Eugene de Sabla, Louis Sloss, Frank Griffin, W. P. Hammon, Joseph D. Grant, William H. Crocker, James Follis, George Pope, Frank Carolan and—R. G. Hanford. That organization was the result of three years of hard work. When Hanford started, a dredge-miner would not look at land that promised less than twenty-five cents to the ton; but he perfected machinery which enabled him to get profits from mineral that ran 10 cents to the ton. No stockholder has ever been sorry that Hanford got him into Natomas.

His Matrimonial Adventure

Hanford has been married twice. He was still married to the first Mrs. Hanford when on the links at Del Monte in 1904 he met the beautiful Mrs. Valdamar Cavalsky. She had been before her marriage Miss Gabrielle Guittard, one of the prettiest girls in San Francisco; and when she wedded Valdamar Cavalsky, the dentist, there were many swains who mourned. When she and Hanford met on the links it was love at first sight. Hanford could no longer simulate affection for his spouse. "Once in every man's lifetime," he wrote to his wife—and the letter was afterwards read in court—"he experiences the grand passion. I have experienced the grand passion for Gabrielle Cavalsky." There was only one thing to do after this frank avowal. Mrs. Hanford secured a divorce, Valdamar Cavalsky followed her example, and Robert G. Hanford took the fair golfer to wife. For once the "grand passion" led to the altar.

On Smith's Steam Yacht

After the de la Montanya tragedy Hanford went to New York and it was explained, with considerable plausibility, that he had hurried east to lay before his wife the true story of the dinner party which ended in death. As a matter of fact Hanford went east and to Europe in pursuance of the scheme which he has just consummated. On Francis M. Smith's steam yacht off New York he matured the plans for the United Properties Company. The idea had come to him ten years before and he had remarked casually to his younger brother, "Some day I will organize all the big interests around the bay." After the plans had been perfected Hanford went to Europe for the necessary capital. For this scheme is not being financed in San Francisco. The San Francisco bankers have nothing to do with it. Why? Well, the San Francisco banks carry Spring Valley bonds, and one of Hanford's pet ideas is to throw the Tevis water properties into San Francisco in competition with Spring Valley. So the local banks are "sore" about Hanford and he is not too fond of them. The banks are eager to learn whence the United Properties is getting its golden streams of cash, but so far it is a mystery. Last week when Hanford paid out five millions in cash to clear some of the United Properties' holdings of debt, he was unkind enough to send the coin to the banks in unmarked sacks, thereby keen-edging curiosity.

A Wizard with Figures

Perhaps we will begin to see more of Hanford in San Francisco from now on. I am not quite sure. He is as elusive as Edmond Dantes. When you meet him you will find him a well preserved, floridly handsome man of about fifty, with gray hair and a close-clipped mustache. He is a fastidious dresser who likes clubs and society. One other characteristic is worth mentioning. He is a wizard with figures. He can absorb, arrange, assimilate and combine page after page of figures as quickly almost as he can read them. That is one reason for his success in daring schemes of organization. Figures speak to him more plainly than to the majority of financiers; they have vitality—and Hanford has imagination.

The Lampooning of De Young

Somebody has been very busy lampooning Mr. M. H. De Young. The mails have been flooded with cartoons and other printed matter calculated to bring ridicule on the proprietor of the Chronicle. The stuff was mailed in New Orleans and purports to be the handiwork of the Fair boosters of that city, but nobody with an ounce of sense is deceived by a trick so transparent. If its anonymous scurrility had its inspiration in New Orleans the implied compliment to Mr. De Yung would be far greater than he deserves; for it would mean that of all the San Francisco boosters none had done more effective work than he. Obviously if there are men in New Orleans who think that the proprietor of the Chronicle is making himself ridiculous by his methods of conducting the Fair campaign hardly likely is it that they believe it to be to their interest to discourage him. Still less likely is it that they would spend several hundred dollars of printed matter disparaging him to be distributed in this city. No, the deception is transparent. The author of it lacks subtlety. Besides the workmanship has a local flavor. It smells of our own little parish. My conjecture is that somebody who wants to be director-general is guilty of a very detestable trick.

He Is in the Hospital

Lieutenant-Colonel Robert F. Ames of the Twelfth Infantry arrived on the transport Sheridan a few days ago and went to the General Hospital at the Presidio. I do not know from what ailment Ames is suffering but I would not be surprised if he had succumbed to the ill effects of too long a stay in the tropics combined with worry over the Janney case. It will be recalled that it was at the home of the lieutenant-colonel in Manila that the dinner party took place which ended in the suicide of Lieutenant Janney, the husband of Madeline McKissick. Lieutenant Janney is said to have recognized the champagne cooler at the table as one which he had presented to his wife. A stormy scene followed and the tragedy that came immediately afterwards involved the Twelfth Infantry in an unparalleled number of courts martial. Lieutenant-Colonel Ames was tried for conduct unbecoming an officer, but was cleared; though the findings of the court were afterwards severely criticized by General Potts, the commander of the Department of Luzon. No doubt the trouble which he has had would suffice to break down the health of a stronger man than Ames. But back of the whole thing is the question, Does the United States keep its army officers in the Philippines too long? A white man cannot stand the tropics for more than a certain time and this is well recognized by the British government in making military assignments to India. Back of the scandals that occur at times in Manila is the terrible influence of the heat on mind and body.

When Whistler Caned Moore

Recollections of the London bohemia of thirty years ago were revived by the recent death of Augustus Moore, the veteran journalist who was once the editor of the Hawk, a weekly paper that once had a great vogue in the British isles. Perhaps not many of the American admirers of George Moore, the novelist, are aware that he and Gus Moore were brothers, or that their father was a famous Irish M. P.—George Henry Moore of Moore Hall, Mayo—himself a journalist and playwright. Although Gus Moore was the author of the libretto of "Les Cloches de Corneville," and was once the "literary adviser" of Sir Augustus Harris at Drury Lane and stage manager for Wilson Barrett, he is best remembered as the editor of the Hawk when he was associated with Jimmy Davis who subsequently wrote "An Artist's Model" and "The Geisha" under the pseudonym of Owen Hall. In the editorial days Moore incurred the ire of the irritable Whistler, and they had a sensational meeting one night in the vestibule of the Drury Lane. Moore was smoking a cigarette when Whistler suddenly struck him across the face with a cane. A struggle followed, and although opinions varied as to the actual course of the conflict there was no doubt about Whistler having ultimately to pick himself up from the floor.

Each of the protagonists afterward gave his version of the incident. "I started out," said Whistler, "to cane this fellow with as little emotion as I would prepare to kill a rat. I did cane him, to the satisfaction of my many friends and his many enemies, and that was the end of it." "I am sorry," wrote Mr. Moore for his part, "but I have had to slap Mr. Whistler. My Irish blood got the better of me, and before I knew it the shrivelled up little monkey was knocked over and kicking about on the floor."

Was Engaged to Miss McCalla

Frank Stayton, the Britisher who wrote "The Inferior Sex" for Maxine Elliott, was once engaged to Miss Stella McCalla, the cultured daughter of Admiral McCalla and the only one of the four sisters who clings to spinsterhood. As Miss McCalla is in town at present, stopping at one of the swaggar apartment houses with her mother, she has probably attended the performance at the Savoy. It happened in Paris three or four years ago. Miss McCalla met Stayton, there was a quick mutual attraction and an engagement. But the romance was short-lived; the engagement was broken and Stayton went back to London to resume his literary labors.

A Tangle in Genealogy

It is with much regret that I learn of the serious illness of Mrs. O. C. Pratt. She is a charming woman with a host of friends; incidentally, she has a host of relations. I do not know whether the ramifications of her family tree have ever been properly studied by our bavardes. Mrs. Pratt is the widow of Judge O. C. Pratt. She is the mother of Mrs. James Keeney and of Mrs. George Harding of Philadelphia who arrived in this city on Thursday to be at her bedside. Before her marriage to Judge Pratt Mrs. Pratt's name was Mrs. Jones and she was the mother of two girls, Lily and Adele who were noted beauties. Judge Pratt had also been married before and had two children. The daughter is married and lives in Chico; the son Orville Pratt was the father of Orville Pratt Jr. who married a Miss Brown of Berkeley and died shortly after the fire. His widow, Mrs. Orville Pratt of Berkeley is constantly confused with Mrs. Orville Pratt of Burlingame. Orville Pratt of Burlingame is the son of Judge and Mrs. O. C. Pratt. It was he who eloped with Emily Wilson, the daughter of Mrs. Russell Wilson. He is the half-brother of Mrs. James Keeney, the uncle of Mary Keeney. Further relationships might be established, but it is all rather confusing and not particularly important. What I have established ought to be of assistance to the bavardes.

Miss Crocker and Her Gardener

I was not only surprised but indignant the other day when one of my friends in San Rafael called my attention to the following item which appeared in the columns of the San Rafael Independent:

"Miss Jennie Crocker, one of the 400 of San Mateo and many times a millionairess, has permitted friends to circulate a subscription list to bury her gardener, who was killed at her home in San Mateo on last Saturday, while removing a large palm tree.

"The body of Henry Mayne was brought to Eden's Undertaking Parlors yesterday and German friends and acquaintances in San Rafael are making provisions for his burial.

"Strange to say, this young woman, with all her wealth and every day display of charity, would permit the body to be shipped from San Mateo without inquiring as to whether or not he had enough of this world's goods to provide for a respectable burial."

Knowing Miss Crocker, I cannot but be indignant that such statements should appear in the public prints. Of course there must be a mistake about this matter. The young lady is incapable of ungenerous conduct, and it is too bad it should be attributed to her merely because circumstances seem to warrant the imputation. The probability is of course that Miss Crocker was entirely ignorant of the unhappy situation. A woman who performs her charities unostentatiously among strangers is not likely to be deliberately neglectful of one of her own household.

Cholly's Charade

There is no writer of the daily press who affords me so much delight as Cholly Francisco of the Examiner. A sprightly writer is Cholly on somewhat familiar terms with French, which he airs gracefully, but on still more familiar terms with the swelles and belles of our provincial aristocracy about whom he rhapsodizes with an exhilarating and infectious enthusiasm. But sometimes Cholly is mystifying, as for example when he told us the other day that as far as "general pulchritude" is concerned the San Francisco woman "makes the women of other places seem like mere replicas" and concludes with a quotation from a poet:

"For Heaven made her what she is
And ne'er made such another."

Here it seems to me is a very pretty charade. I have puzzled over it in vain. What does Cholly mean by telling us that the beauties of all countries look like replicas of the San Francisco beauty who is unique inasmuch as Heaven has failed to duplicate her?

Mr. J. Arthur of Scotland is a guest at Del Monte while on a tour of the Pacific States.

A Time-Honored Story

Cholly's prose lyric on the beauty of Francisco women was inspired by a book written by Grand Duke Boris of Russia in which a connoisseur of feminine charms pays eulogistic tribute to the complexion, figure and temperament of the skirted sex of this city. Naturally Cholly took occasion to drag in that repeated story that when Duke Boris was in this city he said Mrs. Sterling Postley was one of the most beautiful women in San Francisco. The story has become one of the stock stories of the bavardes of the daily press. It is a story that have long been fond of, for the reason perhaps that I had the pleasure of launching it on the sea of journalism. Now that it is embalmed in tradition perhaps for the sake of posterity should make known the authority upon which published it. My authority was that cultured clubman Tom McCaleb who accompanied Duke Boris to Del Monte where he introduced him to the Postleys and where the Duke had the pleasure of dancing with Mrs. Postley. I have always believed the story because Tom told it.

It is not every day that we are privileged to entertain an American ambassador to the Court of St. James, so there is surely going to be great todo when the distinguished party arrives. I doubt whether Mr. and Mrs. Reid will excite as much interest as their daughter Mrs. John Ward. John Ward was an equerry to King Edward VII. Literally interpreted that means that Ward had charge of all the king's horses, both his thoroughbreds of course, but the horses which figured in court functions. In a more practical sense it means that he was very close to the throne; that he could, so to speak, whisper in the king's ear when he had anything of sufficient import to justify that rather familiar act. Mr. John Ward was therefore a personage during the last reign. Just what her standing is in the court of King George V. I have not been informed; but no doubt it is impressive enough. On this neck of the woods we rarely have an opportunity to entertain the friends of great monarchs and when such personages come our way they are likely to be of the Colonel Kowalevsky sort who have no social pretensions. I venture to predict that with the approach of Mrs. John Reid the local booksellers will receive orders for the latest editions of Burke and DeBrett and that a lot of ambitious men and women who have some day to be presented at court in London will lay in a stock of heraldic cultrine.

Lord Decies Too

Interesting too is the news that Lord Decies and his bride Miss Vivian Gould are to spend their honeymoon in California. Lord Decies is a great man. That is apparent from his name which runs as follows: John Graham Hope Horsley Beresford Baron Decies. A man who has the blood of the Grahams, Hopes, Horsleys and Beresfords in his aristocratic veins must be a great man. It has been said that Lord Decies is too old for Miss Gould, but that remains to be proved. Let us not hasten to conclusions. He is forty-five, which is not old for an Irishman, and Decies is an Irishman. He himself says that it is "tommyrot," this talk of his being too old. The word is emphatic and does not suggest dodging decrepitude. Of course it cannot be said that Miss Gould is very young. She is only seventeen. A difference of twenty-eight years between bride and groom is a very serious thing. But let us reserve judgment. We will have an opportunity to observe whether the disparity is one of feeling as well as age when the distinguished couple appear in our midst. Men and women are as old or as young as they feel. Lord Decies may feel seventeen years young or Miss Gould may feel forty-five years old; it is immaterial. Besides, it is hardly our business anyway.

Arthur Inkersley's Marriage

Not for a long time have I read of a more interesting marriage ceremony than that which made Mrs. Fearn of Louisiana the wife of Arthur Inkersley, for many years a newspaperman of this city. My information is derived from the Wiltshire County, England, Mirror and Express, for the wedding took place in grand old Salisbury Cathedral, one of the venerable show places of the tight little island. As I have mentioned before Mr. Inkersley's bride is the daughter of a wealthy southern planter and the widow of Mr. Walter Fearn who was United States minister to Roumania and Serbia, afterwards to Greece, and at the time of his death a member of the International Court of Egypt. Arthur Inkersley was at Brasenose, Oxford, when Dr. Wordsworth, now the Bishop of Salisbury, was a tutor there; hence the choice of Salisbury Cathedral as the scene of the wedding. It was the bishop who performed the wedding ceremony. A very interesting circumstance was the presence at the wedding of Mr. and Mrs. Whitelaw Reid who are close personal friends of the bride. Among others who attended were the Earl and Countess of Jersey, Lord and Lady Acheson, Lady Alexander and Lady Dawkins. The bride and groom are at present at Ascot where they have been entertained by Mrs. Mountney Jephson, formerly Miss Anna Head of this city, and the Misses Liddell, daughters of the late Dean Liddell and sisters of "Alice in Wonderland." They will soon leave for Paris where they will be the guests of Mrs. Barton French who is the daughter of Mrs. Inkersley. Later they will attend the coronation in London, Mrs. French being a friend of the king. All of which indicates that Arthur Inkersley and his bride have assumed a social position such as few Americans attain in Great Britain. His career as a newspaperman is doubtless at an end.

She Has Toned Down

A friend recently returned from the East informed me that Mrs. Alice Roosevelt Longworth is now spoken of as one of the most exquisitely gowned women in the country; also that it is being remarked that the erstwhile madcap princess has toned down into an elegant, quiet woman of the world. People who met her when she was entertained in this city by Mrs. Eleanor Martin, if they should meet her now, would find it hard to realize that she is the same woman. She has entirely abandoned the flippant manner that is said to have been characteristic a year or so ago when the story was told of how she lost the friendship of the dignified Mrs. Elkins. "I suppose," she is reported to have said to that lady, "when Katherine makes her morganatic marriage with the Duke of the Abruzzi, you will ignore us small fry completely?" To which Mrs. Elkins made reply: "I think I will not wait until then."

Trouble in the Suffrage Councils

I note with interest that Mrs. Clarence Mackay, Mrs. George Gould, Mrs. Charles Dana Gibson, Mrs. E. R. Thomas and other active suffragists of New York have taken part in a tableau entertainment for the purpose of raising funds for The Cause. With even more interest I note that neither Mrs. Belmont nor Mrs. William Ivins, ladies who are ordinarily a bit more active than any others in promoting The Cause, were conspicuous by their non-participation in the entertainment. And thereby hangs a tale. It seems that instead of the tableau entertainment there was to be a great suffrage bazaar at the Plaza and a concert by Madame Nordica. Mrs. Belmont was chosen chairman of the committee in charge of the bazaar. She promptly interested her wealthy friends with the result that a beautiful automobile and some antique furniture and jewels were donated. Mrs. Belmont proposed that they be raffled to the great profit of The Cause. That caused the trouble. Mrs. Ivins who is said to be a very important person, her husband having once run for mayor of New York, pointed out that a raffle would be in violation of the Hughes gambling law. Mrs. Belmont retorted with some asperity that raffles were held in every bazaar and that no police interference took place. She added piously that she wanted to make money for The Cause. "And if you can't make it honestly, you'll make it dishonestly!" flashed back Mrs. Ivins. The fur flew for some time and then the matter was put to a vote. Out of thirty women twenty-four voted with Mrs. Belmont; only six were sticklers for the law as opposed to the higher good of The Cause. Mrs. Ivins promptly threw up her position of treasurer; and when the rank and file of the movement heard of the affair, they sustained her position and so, Mrs. Belmont resigned the chairmanship. It is said that she resigned with considerable display of temper. So the bazaar was abandoned, the Nordica concert was abandoned; and the tableaux were given without the assistance of either Mrs. Belmont or Mrs. Ivins. All of which is very sad. It will convince some that women are not yet fit for the franchise; it will convince others that they are worthy to exercise it. And there you are, as the vulgar say.

A wedding which will come as a distinct surprise to society is that of Miss Ruby Temple Shaw, second daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James A. Shaw, and Charles Albert Carman of Vancouver, B. C. The ceremony took place in Christ Church, Vancouver, on Wednesday, January 11. It was a quiet affair, only relatives being present. The bride is a member of one of the oldest Sonoma

Maxine Elliott and "The Inferior Sex"

By Edward F. O'Day

At the beginning of "The Inferior Sex" the playwright opens a pint of champagne. I cannot help feeling sorry that it isn't a quart. I would not object if it were a magnum. For that pint of champagne inspires the playwright. As its bubbles rise his fancy effervesces. By its sparkle his imagination is fired. But it is only a pint and a pint of champagne there is, after all, a very limited fund of inspiration. A moment's mirth, a little laughter, a quickened pulse—and the pint is gone. "Waiter, another bottle and make it a quart this time." But no, the playwright is abstemious; he is probably afraid of a headache. There is no more champagne. It's so bad and I can easily imagine Miss Maxine Elliott feeling sorry about it. For, stimulated by two glasses of champagne, Miss Elliott was delightful. I hope I will not be misunderstood. It is not that Miss Elliott needs the stimulus of the wine (which may not be wine at all, or ought I know). But being an actress she does need stimulation from her playwright and he applied it most happily in the champagne episode. The champagne overpowers Miss Elliott quite naturally too, for she hasn't had anything to eat for thirty-six hours. So she becomes just a trifle ebrious. In a perfectly lady-like way of course. There is an agreeable mist before her eyes; there is a pleasant glow within her; she grows mischievous, jocular; she laughs a good deal. It is really a most delicious situation and admirably enacted by Miss Elliott. But it lasts for such a short time. After that brief display of true comedy the severest member of the W. C. T. U.—supposing that members of the rather awful society sometimes attend comedies—the severest local optionist would be tempted to demand that Miss Elliott look again up the wine when it is amber. Why, oh why is there not more champagne in "The Inferior Sex"? It would be less regrettable if there were other episodes in the play to rouse Miss Elliott out of her self-consciousness. But there are no others of the sort. Except for the few moments when her beautiful head swims a bit and her wonderful eyes flash back the challenge of the grape, Miss Elliott is permitted to play herself. She is on exhibition as the queen of pulchritude that she is, exerting her great charms on a man far from susceptible. Miss Elliott's pulchritude is the plot of "The Inferior Sex." The question that presents itself immediately after she recovers from the exhilaration of the champagne is, Will Miss Elliott be able to subdue this misogynist on whose yacht she has so strangely happened? Nobody is for a minute in doubt about the answer. To entertain doubt about the power of Miss Elliott's beauty would argue a degree of hebetude which cannot possibly exist anywhere. So we have only to await developments and study Miss Elliott's beauty. I know no more delightful study. Pope gets the matter all wrong. The proper study of mankind is feminine beauty like Miss Elliott's. Compared to it the study of marble goddesses in silent museums is a dryas dust pursuit. And in "The Inferior Sex" it can be pursued without distraction. One forgets Miss Elliott's beauty in the few moments of the champagne episode when she is really acting, but never afterwards. The rest of the play simply gives us Miss Elliott in full face, Miss Elliott in profile and Miss Elliott at various angles of vision. Now our attention is directed to Miss Elliott's glorious hair; now it is deftly concentrated on her splendidly moulded arms; again it is drawn to the nape of her exquisite neck. All this is interest enough for any play; it is plot enough for "The Inferior Sex." That name, by the way, is another subtle means of drawing attention to Miss Elliott's beauty. Think of calling that "the inferior sex" which is adorned by such members as Miss Elliott! Has the superior sex anyone to compare with her? Would any member of the superior sex dare to tell Miss Elliott to her distracting face that she belongs to the inferior sex? The thing is unthinkable. For her beauty inspires one with awe; it is not a thing to trifle with; it is—shall I say it?—just a bit haughty, unbending. Except in that fleeting moment or so when she unbent to the champagne and acted. But one must not ask too much from Miss Elliott. Not that she is chary about giving. When I last saw her there was a great deal of champagne in her play, figuratively speaking, and she acted admirably. I have forgotten the play, however, which seems to prove that after all it is Miss Elliott herself and not her play, whether it be a good play or a bad, which scores the lasting impression. Perhaps with the most serious intentions in the world Miss Elliott will never be acclaimed a great actress. She is too beautiful. And bearing Lillian Russell in mind, we know that she has many years of beauty before her. She will be the absorbing plot of many a play after "The Inferior Sex" is forgotten.

The Kocian Farewell Concert

Jarislav Kocian, the young Bohemian violin virtuoso whose success this week has amply demonstrated his right to be classed among the world's very greatest musicians, will give his farewell concert at Christian Science Hall this Sunday afternoon, January 22, at 2:30 o'clock, assisted by the fine pianist Maurice Eisner. The program which Kocian will offer will include numbers by Edouard Lale, Bach, Caesar, Cui, Ries, Wieniawski and by the player himself. M. Eisner's numbers will be from Brahms-Gluck, Bach-Saint-Saens and Weber-Godowsky.

"The Girl in the Taxi" Coming

Coming to the Columbia Theater next Monday night is "The Girl in the Taxi." "The Girl in the Taxi" is said to be far in excess of anything of its kind seen in many years. Paris, Berlin and several other European capitals, in addition to the large eastern cities, are declared to have greeted "The Girl in the Taxi" with enthusiasm. It is an adaptation from Anthony Mar's "Like Father Like Son," and Stanislaus Stange who made the translation, found it necessary to interpolate several musical and dancing complications which crowd the three acts of the piece. The cast to present the play in San Francisco contains many well-known players. Heading the list will be found that local favorite, Bobby Barry, best remembered for his good work in "Little Johnny Jones" when it was first given here at the old Columbia and who at every succeeding visit has enhanced his popularity.

The Sigmund Beel Violin Concerts

Sigmund Beel, the eminent violinist, will give two concerts under the Greenbaum management at Christian Science Hall, the dates being Thursday night, February 2, and Sunday afternoon, February 5. At the first concert Beel will offer a Handel "Sonata, Vieuxtemps "Concerto," Bach "Sonata" and smaller works by Debussy, Pugnani-Kreisler, Hubay and Sinigaglia; and at the Sunday matinee he will play the famous "Chaconne" by Vitali, the Saint-Saens "Concerto" and other important numbers.

"The Chocolate Soldier"

Miss Maxine Elliott in "The Inferior Sex" will appear at the Savoy for the last times this Saturday afternoon and evening and on Monday night "The Chocolate Soldier," that long looked-for-comic opera, will begin an engagement limited to two weeks. The work is founded on the play, "Arms and the Man." Oscar Straus is said to have written harmonies around the ideas of George Bernard Shaw that overflow with music to be remembered. It is promised by producer Frederic C. Whitney that the Chicago production, considered a fine one, will be sent here. It includes the original opera comique orchestra of thirty-five and the great chorus. Matinees will be given on Thursday and Saturday and at the conclusion of the run of "The Chocolate Soldier" James T. Powers will appear in "Havana."

"Is Matrimony a Failure?"

David Belasco's latest and greatest comedy success, "Is Matrimony a Failure?" will be given its initial presentation by a stock company next Monday evening at the Alcazar. It held the boards of the Belasco Theater, New York, seven months of last year and is now on tour in the East. Through the courtesy of David Belasco his brother Frederic secured exclusive right to present the play on the Pacific Coast. "Is Matrimony a Failure?" was adapted by Leo Dietrichstein from a play which is still on the boards in Vienna and Berlin. In the adaptation all characters are American types and the scenes laid in Rosedale, a country town near New York. It is a smugly-respectable community, and when a lawyer discovers that the thirty-five couples legally married there is, to put it mildly, a sensation. In this merry offering are all the regular Alcazarans and a large number of extra players.

New Acts at the Orpheum

The Orpheum bill next week will be headed by Clayton White and Marie Stuart who will appear in George V. Hobart's one-act comedy "Cherie." The reappearance of these two players should be the signal for a cordial expression of approval. Porter J. White, an actor who has been successfully identified with many prominent roles, will present "The Visitor," a one-act play by his brother Oliver, who is the author of many irate sketches. Charles B. Lawlor and his two daughters Mabel and Alice come with a vocal character sketch entitled "Night and Day on the decks of New York." The Victoria Four, consisting of Messrs. Storm, Reals, Billbury and Loo will be heard in popular melodies. Arthur Brown and Annie Nevaro, acrobats and comedians, will be included in the new bill. Next week will be the last of Lillian Burkhardt, Julius Tannen and the Five Cycling Auroras.

Impressive Drama at Ye Liberty

For the first time anywhere by a stock company the Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will offer a presentation of Charles Rann Kennedy's widely discussed play, "The Servant in the House" on next Monday evening. Since its advent about two years ago it has taken rank as one of the most remarkable plays ever presented upon the American stage, and has proven not only a triumph for Mr. Kennedy's literary ability but a most popular success as well. Twice the companies of Henry Miller have visited the coast in "The Servant in the House" with complete success, and the long runs the piece enjoyed in New York and Chicago proved that its appeal is general. Manager Bishop has selected an excellent cast for the play. Sydney Ayres will appear as Manson; Henry Shumer as the "drain-man"; George Webster as the Bishop; Andrew Bennison as the Vicar; Miss Calhoun as his wife and Miss Ramona Radcliffe has been specially engaged for the role of the drain-man's daughter.

way, but he knows all that they could teach him and a whole lot more. He can read a score in French or German and can smooth a ruffled artistic temperament in Spanish or Italian. The newspaperman who wishes to interview a star who has no English finds Greenbaum a tower of strength.

Speaking of artistic temperament, nobody knows more about that psychological phenomenon than Greenbaum. He has never had any trouble with his artists, real trouble. When a Pavlowa gets hysterics or a diva refuses to sing, Greenbaum smiles and is unafraid. He doesn't coax, he doesn't threaten, he doesn't storm. There is nothing of the Oscar Hammerstein about him. He doesn't think it worth while. He shrugs his shoulders, twinkles through his glasses and if there's a loss he charges it to profitable experience. And very frequently there is a loss. It doesn't always pay to give San Francisco the best that can be had in music or other forms of art. We are not invariably appreciative. So Greenbaum frequently loses money. The only consolation is that when he has a financial success it is usually a big one.

He has his own opinion of artists and artistes, has Greenbaum—and it is sometimes uncomplicated. It is one of his idiosyncrasies that he never associates with them off the stage if he can help it. One would say that he wishes to preserve his illusions, if he had illusions, but he hasn't. He has been thrown in contact with performers—and, let me whisper this part of it, with critics—too long.

For the rest, it is perhaps sufficient to say that Will L. Greenbaum is the only impresario I have ever known who is more interested in the performance than in the box office. Sometimes he becomes so enthusiastic that he forgets about the balance sheet. I have seen him wax melancholy over a sour note when the "S. R. O." sign was displayed in the lobby. I wonder if that is due to his provincial education?

No Risk

"Susannah," asked the preacher, when it came her turn to answer the usual questions in such cases, "do you take this man to be your wedded husband, for better or for worse—"

"Jes' as he is, pahson," she interrupted, "jes as he is. Ef he gits any bettah Ah'll know de good Lawd's gwine to take 'im; an ef he gets any wusser, w'ye, Ah'll tend to 'im myself."

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Sentiment among the New York professional traders has been very optimistic during the past week and as a result prices have scored a fair upturn, although there was some little shading off at the close of the week. The principal factors have been the attitude of the banking interests in supporting the market, apparently for the purpose of successfully floating the $40,000,000 bond issue of the New York Central and the probable issue of $100,000,000 new stock by the Pennsylvania Railroad. In order to facilitate the sale of these new bonds and stocks it is necessary that we experience a strong stock market and for this reason it looks as if prices would not be allowed to sag until this new financing is out of unfilled orders was about the worst of its kind that has been published, but even this was not allowed to become a factor and was even followed immediately by an announcement by the president of the corporation that, in his opinion, we had seen the worst in the steel trade and that from now on he expects an improvement in this line. The fact that prices for the unfinished article were not cut at the meeting of the Steel Corporation would indicate that the president was not alone in his opinion. The winter wheat belt has had an abundance of moisture and this is an added help to the stock market, as drought talk was beginning to make itself felt. Money on call has been easy and the New York banks are in better shape than for some time, the weekly bank statement showing for the first time a decrease in loans, accompanied by a large increase in deposits. We feel very friendly to the stock market and barring any unfavorable court decisions, prices generally should work higher.

Wheat—A strong and higher market the early part of the week was brought about by the big La Salle Street bull. The trailing speculators recognized the power of the big buyers and followed them, spoiling the market in its upward flight by taking profits as they went along. Merchandising and milling features of the situation are not very different from the speculative. Interior mills seem to have what they need for present requirements and are replenishing in their own localities. Wealthy owners control the supplies at the big points of accumulation and smaller people seem content to let them hold for such profits as the situation may develop. In the last few days the speculative market has been a nervous and uneasy affair, plainly disposed to decline if left to itself but at the same time requiring but little new buying to start it upward again. Except for the day to day scalping there is no short interest worth going after, the big holding of the bulls being evidently represented principally by the hedging sales made against cash wheat in the various positions.

Corn—Considerable changes have been made in the last week in the corn situation, but net changes in prices have been trifling. Cable advice have been numerous and positive enough to indicate that the Argentine corn crop will be a small one, but exporters report that the resulting European demand was promptly filled up and that the Europeans have over-bought for the present. Nevertheless, unless the Argentine reports contain too much of speculative hysteria, the American and Danubian corn seems destined to supply much of the European demand this year. The extra call can in no event prove large enough to offset the difference between this year's crop and last, as this difference, 353,000,000 bushels is 50 per cent larger than any crop Argentine ever raised.

Cotton—There was a lack of speculative interest in cotton during the past week and values experienced a slight decline. The usual bullish talk from Manchester seems to be losing its weight and prices, while firm, do not respond to this kind of news unless it is accompanied by buying orders, which were lacking. The trade is beginning to pay some attention to the large receipts which were expected to diminish after the first of the year but which as yet show no signs of falling off. Stocks of cotton at all primary markets are increasing and it looks now as if the predicted 12,000,000 bale yield by the bears would be realized. As to the prospects for the next crop, the best information that we can get from Texas is to the effect that the greater part of the State has ample moisture and that not only will the acreage be largely increased the coming year but that commercial fertilizers will be introduced on an extensive scale. Farmers have become convinced that the steadily diminishing yield of cotton per acre is not due so much to the Mexican boll weevil as to the impoverishment of the land as a result of the old system of agriculture which continually subtracts from the soil the elements of plant life.

Plucked His Flock

"Wonderful the changes that come over a man's life, isn't it?" remarked Captain Hawkesley, reflectively, as he gathered up his winnings at the club the other night and watched his latest victim depart sadly in quest of his topcoat. "How well I recall the time spent in the old country home, when I was an innocent lad and kept pigeons. And now, now," he added, grimly, "they have to keep me."

A Social Success

lans, to the great edification of papa and ama, who can't even keep their everyday old accounts, and of Father d'Aube, who is riar from being a shining light in the field of atlantics—and of Mother d'Aube, who can't ar a word.

However, the handsome councillor, if he is edaic, is not a fool, so, about the time the ous came on, he became aware that he was rrying his audience with him.

"I fear a conversation of this calibre must be be to you, mademoiselle," said he, turning

"Oh! not at all, monsieur; I was not listening," elied, as sweetly innocent as you please.

To my unbounded joy I beheld the direst mnsration depicted upon the countenances of y unfortunate relatives and of good old Ma- am Espalier. Madame Salandier gave me such gnce as a Chinese bonze might give if he saw P's gamin in the act of making faces at his tuda. Monsieur de Nivert was smiling gleec- ally "Son," although a trifle out of counten- nce I think, went on:

"The truth, such talk is somewhat over the heads of European young girls. In America, now, ould be different. There, in some of the tals, the women are even allowed to vote."

"Do you hear that, Juliette?" cried mamma, stn admiration.

Har it! You'd better believe I heard it! He vasetting on my nerves, this political econom- st of a suitor, and I let him know it pretty uidly. I took up the accusation of frivolity hich his speech contained; but, alas! I waved it lojin triumph, as if it were the famous white lue of Navarre. Boldly I defended my right, height of all pretty women, to be ignorant, eer-brained, capricious. I upheld trifling as gnt earnestness, chic as against dignity of lepartment. Oh, if you could have seen the faces f apa, of the two Relics of the Empire, of 'Sds' mother, of "Son" himself! "Son," espec- ally seemed almost dazed at encountering a ous person who dared to answer back and ori with her little pins the windbag of his fine phases. De Nivert alone preserved his pres- end of mind and egged me on with smiles and mured bravos.

The meeting broke up in confusion. In the rring-room I became once more a right-minded ous girl and poured coffee with perfect prop- erty.

At the shock had been too much for them. Madame Salandier tried to save the situation by ushing if Mademoiselle Juliette would not give h a little music.

"With pleasure," says mamma, in a voice of ropy.

Oh! thought I, you want music, do you? Well, ous are going to get it, your music! Just wait! I seated myself at the piano and began. I led, and played, and played, without a halt, evrything and anything that came into my ucl; it soothed my nerves a bit, to pound the ite black and white ivories.

Oh, you want music! Here you are, then! ssenet, Mozart, Serpette, Wagner, Beethoven, ocq, Berlioz, Tschaiowsky, no-matter-who- k!—one after the other, helter-skelter, just as y came, in torrents, in cataracts!

One hour and three-quarters of it without a eup! At the end of which time I turned and templatd my audience with the happy air uttoner innocence. They looked like a plantation after a hailstorm; they seemed utterly crushed. As one man they rose and, profiting by the lull, fled. My fingers still rested on the keys; at any moment I might fall to once more! Within five minutes the drawing-room was vacant. Mamma advanced upon me with, "And now, miss, if you will oblige me by ex—"

But I cut her short:

"Now you know, mamma, I am fairly well be- haved and I do not often have an attack of nerves; but tonight—yes, I have one. Do, please, let me alone. We will talk tomorrow as much as you like!" And up I rushed to my room.

This morning, on coming down, I was fully prepared to find my relatives with faces a yard long. Wonder of wonders, they were all smiles, they clasped me to their bosoms, they were honey and sugar!

The key to the mystery? Behold it! Yester- day evening, about midnight, papa and Monsieur de Nivert having met at the club, the latter ad- vanced upon papa with:

"My dear Givernay, your daughter is adorable! You will, I trust, permit me to pay my respects very soon again?"

But, more wonderful still, an hour before breakfast came a letter from Madame Salandier in which that old vender of chestnuts declared that "Son" had been much impressed with the grace and wit of Mademoiselle Juliette, and so on and so on, and wound up by asking if my mother could receive her Monday for the pur- pose of talking matters over with a view to business.

My friend Pepita is evidently in the right when she says: "Little Juliette, there are two categor- ies of men that have to be trampled on if one is to make anything of them—servants and suitors."

Eat and Get Thin

This is turning an old phrase face about but modern methods of reducing fat have made this revision possible.

If you are overfat and also averse to physical exertion and likewise fond of the table and still want to reduce your excess flesh several pounds, do this: Go to your druggist (or write the Marmola Co., 1220 Farmer Bldg., Detroit, Mich.) and give him (or send them) 75 cents. For this modest amount of money the druggist will put you in the way of satisfying your ambition for a nice, trim, slim figure. He will hand you a large case of Marmola Prescription Tablets (compounded in accordance with the famous Marmola Prescription), one of which you must take after each meal and at bedtime until you begin to lose your fat at the rate of 12 to 16 ounces a day. That is all. Just go on eating what you like, leave exercis- ing to the athletes, but take your little tablet faithfully and without a doubt that flabby flesh will quickly take unto itself wings, leaving behind it your natural self, neatly clothed in firm flesh and trim muscles.

Auto Notes

The Packard Motor Car Company's exhibit of motor trucks during the second week of the New York Automobile Show in Madison Square Garden, January 16 to 21, was a comprehensive display of commercial vehicles of different types. It occupied nearly 5,000 square feet of floor space in the central arena of the Garden.

H. B. Higby is among the most recent purchasers of 1911 Haynes cars, the machine ordered being a fore door suburban. Mr. Higby who owns a Haynes of 1910 model again investigated the market thoroughly before placing his last order, and declares himself satisfied that no car has features promising more than the one he now owns and the one of which is awaiting delivery.

Jack Tehen, associated with the Merchants and Bankers Oil Company of Los Angeles, is a strong advocate of Diamond tires. Speaking of this equipment he recently said, "We have three cars equipped with Diamond tires, namely: Maxwell, Pierce-Arrow Baby Six, and 70 N. Y. Simplex. The tires are giving excellent satisfaction. A car that we sold a short time ago, a Six 40 Pierce, gave us 9,000 miles on the front tires, touring tread, and always over 6,000 on the rear tires, and we covered 23,000 miles on this car before it went into shop. A better combination never existed than a Pierce Six equipped with Diamond tires."

Interest in the big automobile shows which are now in progress, is so far ahead of any excitement ever created in the automobile industry before that the big manufacturers of motor cars take it to indicate a great year for selling cars. The Hudson Motor Car Company of Detroit, for instance, has received hundreds of letters from prospective buyers in all parts of the country asking if they were correct in presuming that the Hudson "33" would be on exhibition at all the big shows. Of course it will be.

Jack L. Glazier who is traveling salesman for the Toledo Scale Company, covering Oregon, Nevada and California, has used his 1909 Chalmers Roadster to make his trip and says he has made a complete trip over his territory eight times; has crossed the Sierra Nevada mountains eighteen times and gone over 36,000 miles of ground and only once has his car been in the shop. He states he would not part with the machine and intends to use it at least another year over the roads of this territory.

With the completion of the new works of the Lozier Motor Company at Detroit, Michigan, next spring, Mr. John G. Perrin, superintendent of the present works at Plattsburg, N. Y., will take charge of the combined works of the Lozier Motor Company at Detroit, Michigan, and Plattsburgh, N. Y., with the title of Chief Engineer and Factory Manager.

"I find it the general opinion of Eastern manufacturers that municipal indorsement of the automobile has done a great deal to put the motor car in good standing with the general public," writes E. P. Brinegar from New York to Calvin C. Eib. "Since the fire and police departments of our largest cities have taken up the motor car officially much of the popular feeling that the auto was only for pleasure has been uprooted. The people, of course, know that fire and police departments would use the automobile only because of its efficiency."

Besides being the premier enthusiast among the aviators, Glen Curtiss is also an automobilist of no small note. Outside of flying Curtiss declares motor car touring is the finest of all out-of-door recreations. He owns a finely equipped garage in which is housed a Chalmers "30" car. Because of his intimate knowledge of motors and motor efficiency Curtiss' selection of any given make of automobile speaks volumes for that car.

While in San Francisco for the purpose of participating in the aviation meet, Curtiss used a Chalmers "30" car.

HUDSON "33"

Reserve Your Hudson Now

687

Sold the First Day

The first day the Hudson "33" was shown dealers took orders and received deposits for 687 cars.

Three-quarters of a million dollars' worth of automobiles sold the first day!

It indicates that within a short time in individual buyers will have contracted for every car we can deliver by May.

We cannot increase our output.

In all probability many buyers will be disappointed then, in that they will be unable to get a Hudson "33."

If the first day's sales indicate anything, all cars will be contracted for by individual buyers before early spring. HADN'T YOU BETTER LOOK AT THE HUDSON "33" NOW?

Another Selina Lou Story

Those who recall with pleasure Maria Thompson Daviess' "Miss Selina Lou" who lived on the Bluff and mothered a row of "soap-boxers," in the rear of her little general store, babies who for one reason or another were left motherless during the day, will have a pleasant greeting ready for "On the Road to Providence," another story by the same author and dealing with much the same kind of people. Indeed, Mother Wentworth of the new book is a cousin of Miss Selina Lou, so there is both kinship and kindness between them though Miss Selina Lou has no part in the new book. Providence is a small village in Tennessee where the world's goods are so evenly divided that though no one is rich none feels poor, there being too little difference to provoke comparison. Mrs. Wentworth, who lives by the roadside, is one of the motherly, sympathetic, large-hearted women who has been for years the good Samaritan of the neighborhood. Her father, her husband and her only son were all doctors, and she had inherited skill and acquired wisdom to add to tact and sympathy, so that, with neither college diploma nor book learning, she had grown to be the acknowledged advisor and head nurse to her community. Dr. Tom Wentworth, her son, was an eminent specialist, sent for a time by the government to make studies and observations of a skin disease which had made its appearance in that section, but he lacked his mother's intimate knowledge of the personality of his fellow villagers as well as her tact, and it frequently happened that the expert opinion and scientific treatment recommended by the son would be rejected for the homely remedy of the mother, for of course a mere boy like Tom Wentworth, whom they had all known in bare feet and knickerbockers could not possibly know anything about doctoring. Mother Mayberry was a notable henwife, and one questions whether her skill in handling her sprangled Wyandottes and Dominicks was acquired through her tactful management of Squire Tutt and Mrs. Peavey or whether the patience and concealed persuasion exercised on the biddies taught her how to deal with refractory humans. At any rate, she had Tom beaten at both tasks. Just as unobtrusively and quietly as she managed all else, Mother Mayberry engineered her match making. There was a great singer who had lost her voice and nearly despaired of ever recovering it, having tried one specialist after another without result. Dr. Tom Mayberry was her last resource, and on the advice of a colleague who had spent some days in peaceful home comfort with the old lady, she was sent down to Providence to be built up under the motherly care of the doctor's mother before undergoing another operation, and just as deftly and unconcernedly as she went about persuading some recalcitrant young hen mother to stay on the nest or hover near her brood, Mother Mayberry, desiring in Elinora Wingate the wife she desired for her solitary chick, proceeded to court each for the other. One is not kept under the Mayberry roof all the time, for there is that interesting family of Pikes across the road which, as is often the case with large households, gives less trouble to their mother in the aggregate than a single child will to its whole relative contingent.

Betty Pike is a born leader who, as quite evident, will take Mrs. Mayberry's place in whatever community she may live, and "Teether" is usually in evidence. Then there is that combination of the Turner-Pratt-Hoover household, the mother being three times married and the combined offspring numbering seventeen, with the wedding arrangements for the last marriage and the honeymoon journey which took in the whole outfit. And there is the little "missionary" whose parents, preparing to save more heathen souls, have no time to devote to him, and whose speech is as clipt as a telegram. "Miss Selina Lou" and "The Road to Providence" belong in the same list as Eliza Calvert Hall's chronicles and those who have enjoyed either her Kentucky stories or Miss Daviess's Tennessee tales will be sure to enjoy the others just as much. Published by the Bobbs-Merrill Company, with illustrations by W. B. King.

Will Irwin's Latest

Though Will Irwin's "Readjustment" is given to us as a novel of "the city that was," it is that only in the sense that the scenes are laid and the acts move through San Francisco and its vicinity previous to 1906. The characters and conditions are just as true today as they were then, and though the restaurants and Bohemian resorts could not now be found at their old locations, they still exist under the old names, the same proprietors, and with no essential modification of their peculiarities. Though the plot is by no means negligible, the chief interest in the story lies in the individual characters and the series of pictures of life as it is lived by a considerable percentage of the population who are neither ultra-rich nor struggling to make ends meet, who might be "in society," did they care to make use of their prerogative but who prefer, for one reason or another, to live in their own way and make their own circle. Though "The Readjustment" deals entirely with the present day there are roots which reach backward to the pioneer period when Rincon Hill was the fashionable quarter and when society in general was much more lenient to the "gentlemanly vice," and extends so that comparatively recent period when it was assumed that a literary man had as much need for a plentiful supply of alcoholic stimulant as he had for pen and ink. Interspersed in every chapter we have characteristic descriptions, of the festivities of Chinatown, the Sunday picnic crowds, the week-end house parties, the Bohemian restaurants, and the easy intimacies made or dropped almost on the spur of a moment, which have made San Francisco a "Coast of Chance." Though "The Readjustment" will appeal especially to residents of our city and its vicinity the interest is by no means confined to them. Good as it is, however, we expect still better things of its author. Published by B. W. Huebsch.

The Conversion of Jordan

In an age of infectious and irrepressible reform when vice seems to be vanishing from the world and wickedness is being abolished with all the speed that can be imparted to the machinery of legislation nothing more than what ought to be expected happens when a veteran practical politician turns from the fleshpots of his profession and consecrates himself to the mission of civic salvation. So why should anybody be astonished at the news that Secretary of State Frank Jordan, lured by the prospect of the glory that is accessible to all who are good, has abandoned the bad ways of a former generation and become an enthusiastic prophet of public righteousness? The metamorphosis of Jordan is but additional evidence of the fact that the public stock of virtue is accumulating. Nowadays no sinner is too hardened to be hopeless; and if we consider some of the latter-day cases of conversion we must realize that grace was within easy reach of Frank Jordan. True Mr. Jordan was one of the most practical of politicians, adept in all the tricks and stratagems of the game, and never loth to avail himself of the spoils and perquisites of office; but he was at least frank and candidly conventional. He never went about professing high ideals or appealing to the dear people on the score of his impregnable virtue, or denouncing his neighbor for being no better than he ought to be. And now if he choose he can play the reformer with far better grace than some of the more prominent patriots at Sacramento. For he was not elected to office under any false pretenses. He went before the people on his demerits and won on his virtues, the virtues of amiability, bonhomie, good temper, and freedom from cant and hypocrisy. These have become rare virtues in political life, and it is hard to compensate for the lack of them. Filled with misgivings, nevertheless we hope that our distinguished Secretary of State is in no danger of suffering the extinction of the salient qualities of his bad days now that he is among the self-anointed who are storming the citadels of corruption and the bulwarks of boodles.

The Canal Question

The probability is that when all is said and done the Panama Canal will be garrisoned and fortified. We are a very rich and a very philanthropic people, and we are quite willing to advance the interests of the world's commerce but not to the extent of denying ourselves advantages and giving them to others. If we had been so foolish as to obligate ourselves by treaty to maintain the canal as a neutral water-way it would now be most discreditable to ignore such obligation, but happily we are in no such embarrassing position. We rejected a proposal to tie our own hands, and we entered into a treaty which implicitly gives us the right to fortify the canal. But this right many good citizens think we should ignore; some because a garrison and millions for fortifications will still further add to the financial burdens of coming generations; others because neutralization would be a step in the direction of universal disarmament. With this latter motive we are not likely to concern ourselves seriously at this time. As to the cost the answer to the objection on that ground is suggested by those who advance it. They tell us it is already plain "that the canal will never pay for itself financially" and that we should not add to the cost. The canal will never pay for itself financially if we do not have the exclusive use of it in time of war. But if by reason of our exclusive use of it we shall be able to circumvent an enemy it may pay for itself within a year after its completion.

The Alien Menace

Now that England has decided to get rid of her Anarchists it is suggested that we ought to anticipate the probable hegira by amending our immigration laws. And once more the sentiment is being avouched that of the foreign infusions into our life some are venomous and should be vehemently resisted, those especially that come from the hotbeds of Socialism. The propagators of this sentiment cannot be aware that we have our own hotbeds of Socialism, or that we have arrived at the point where we have begun to export anarchists for the foreign trade, as they might have learned from the despatches last week in which it was reported that the leader of the Japanese band of Anarchists that conspired against the life of the Mikado was from San Francisco where he imbibed the political doctrines that he had been disseminating in his native land. It may be desirable to amend our immigration laws, but it would be as vain to amend them for the purpose of safeguarding us against anarchy as it is absurd to suppose that we can improve the quality of our citizenry by barring out Socialists. A man is not essentially an undesirable because he is a Socialist. We are all Socialists in a measure, and some of the principles of Socialism are in our statute books. The difference between the average citizen and the average Socialist is nothing more than a difference of opinion on a principle of government, and if there is any advantage in being more humane and more logical than your neighbor the Socialist has a very positive advantage over the average citizen. It is true that there is an affinity between some men who profess to be Socialists and some men who profess to be Anarchists, but it is an affinity of temperament, not of principle. The same kind of affinity exists between Democrats and Anarchists and between Republicans and Anarchists who constitute the great army of disgruntled and unft, and who receive inspiration chiefly from the breeders of class hatred who play the great American game of politics.

The New California

By this time it must be apparent to everyone who has given the subject attention that we have an epoch-making dispensation at Sacramento. A cursory observer may have received the impression that the little band of statesmen now conserving the interests of the commonwealth in the lime light and their own in umbrage is preoccupied chiefly with ways and means of getting a lead-pipe cinch on all the patronage in sight. But such an impression can not survive the most casual inquiry. Of course political pap has not been neglected. Indubitably the victors now on the job are establishing some new precedents for succeeding generations in the pursuit of spoil. But this is for the greater good of all concerned. They are pledged to banish the Octopus, and to carry out this pledge they must intrench themselves at the trough. In the meantime they are not neglecting the equally important business of making law. It is by their laws that they will be commemorated. They are making laws by which the character and temperament of this State will undergo a prodigious change for the better of course. It is the sense of the impeccable statesmen at Sacramento that their constituents are in need of a little more paternalism in government, and that they must be safeguarded against the perils that beset them by reason of the temptations to which they are subjected by a tireless and ingenious devil. They have resolved to vanquish the elemental forces of nature and establish new tests of sin by which righteousness may be revealed. Along with the Octopus old Dionysos must go with his splendid virility, his secret of wine music and ecstasy. We are to be recalled from the voluptuousness in which we are immersed, from the wayward humors, the lively impulses in which we are wont to indulge with freedom and lightness of heart. In short if the abstemious statesmen obsessed with the Kansas idea are to have their way our habits will be made to conform with those whose notions of human pleasure are narrowed by a want of appetite or chronic dyspepsia. Perhaps in the near future we shall all be chanting the Psalm of David on Sunday morning, the pure heart and the thirsty in throat. With this prospect in view of a well nigh perfect State in which ladies will know not the vice of cigarette smoking, and men will not be permitted to treat or witness a baseball game on Sundays, there comes to us a serene sense of public trust well reposed at Sacramento. Of course the complaint will be heard that there has been too much interference with the liberty of the individual. The dissolute are always jealous of the freedom of action. Happily, however, our statesmen cannot be justly accused of being indifferent to the principle of liberty. They have a measure before them whereby they purpose striking off some of the shackles that bind and irritate. This is the measure that provides against compulsory vaccination, the effect of which will be to give everybody the privilege of exposing himself to smallpox. In spite of the scientific dictum that because of vaccination smallpox has ceased to be one of the scourges of mankind there is a strong prejudice against it, and some of our statesmen have decided to make vaccination a matter of choice. We are told that the result may be as in times past that the whole world will pronounce San Francisco an infected port and subject us to the rigors of quarantine, but in the minds of some of our liberty-loving statesmen it is better that the whole city should suffer than that vaccine should be infused into one child against the will of its parents. And anyway who cares what the rest of the world does? This appears to be the prevailing sentiment at Sacramento, for there is to be a law passed to exclude foreign capital from the privilege of investing in California realty. Our motto is to be "California for Americans," and this sentiment may be narrowed down somewhat, for Organized Labor has a lobby at Sacramento and there is talk of making it a crime to run an open shop and of doing other things the effect of which will be to make it prima facie evidence of insanity for anybody to come to this State with money to invest. Years ago the query "What's the matter with Kansas?" was propounded by a resident of that State in a fit of disgust. Perhaps by the time the Panama Canal is opened "What's the matter with California?" will be the absorbing query of the hour in this over-governed land of sunshine and moonshine which was once the great and prosperous sound-money State of the Far and Golden West.

The Lords and the Senate

Notwithstanding its antipathy for all things American the London Saturday Review, organ of the Unionists, has condescended to commend certain sentiments of an American statesman to the consideration of the people of England. Singularly enough though the sentiments were uttered more than half a century ago they are as timely today for the purpose of counsel to the people of this Republic as to the people of the Kingdom that rules the waves. The sentiments are those of Daniel Webster. This is the language in which they were expressed: "If all legislative power be in one popular body, all other power sooner or later will be there also. The Senate is not to be a check on the people, but on the House of Representatives. It is the case of an authority given to one agent to check or control the acts of another. The people having conferred on the House of Representatives powers which are great and from their nature liable to abuse, require for their own security another house which shall possess an effectual negation on the first." These observations the Saturday Review has correctly construed as a defence of the House of Lords, prefacing the quotation thus: "Lately we have lit upon a saying of Daniel Webster which puts the case for the Peers in a few words which might have been spoken of the crisis of today." If the great Union organ would like to light on a few more sayings of the same character it has but to consult the general literature of early American statesmanship. The study of that literature will be found most profitable even by the learned children of Oxford who fancy that the men by whom the constitutional history of England was made are the only modern statesmen from whom light is to be obtained. There is much to be found in that literature having a direct bearing on that great principle of government which by a curious coincidence is now involved in the paramount issues both of British and American politics. The anti-Lords fight in England which has been virtually won by the Lords in two campaigns is on all fours with the fight in this country for the election of Senators by direct vote. The principle at stake is the principle of two separate and distinct bodies. What Daniel Webster said as to the object of that principle does not cover the whole ground; nor did he state with accuracy the theory in which the principle is grounded. The principle has been far more luminously expounded by American statesmen whose knowledge of the science of government was more profound than Webster's. From them may be learned something of the experience of nations out of which that principle was drawn just as we draw principles of criticism from the works of original genius in which they are seen to operate. That experience teaches us that two legislative bodies are essential to the stability of government, and not merely that one may be a check on the other but that all the people may be represented and protected—the minority as well as the majority—and thus that even-handed justice may be administered. The Senate of this country was intended as a check not only on the House of Representatives but on the people themselves for their own benefit and it must cease to serve that purpose if ever it should become directly responsive to the will of the people.

The Purification Idea

Let us briefly examine the arguments of the gentlemen who are in favor of electing Senators by direct vote. We find them in an editorial printed in the Examiner last week. First comes the argument that the present system breeds corruption. "The people," says the Examiner, "sees Senators bought and sold openly and shamelessly"; moreover the present system is the cause of much bribe-giving and bribe-taking. Mr. Hearst would have us believe that under the system proposed there would be no corruption, that men would be elected to the Senate without corrupting anybody and that they would themselves be pure and incorruptible. This would be a most agreeable belief, but how do we know that it would not be conclusive of self-delusion? We elect our Representatives by direct vote, but nobody is so unsophisticated as to believe that the method of their election insures their honesty, or that there is more probity and integrity among them than there is among our Senators. As a matter of fact there have been more and uglier scandals in the lower than in the upper House. Furthermore while it is not to be denied that legislatures have been frequently corrupted by candidates for the Senate, neither is it to be gainsaid that the percentage of Senators who procured their election by corruption is small. Nor is it to be demonstrated that the men now in the Senate who were elected by popular vote of the people are not there as a result of improper bargaining. Indeed the election of some of them was tainted with scandal quite as fragrant as that in which Senator Lorimer is involved. Among the number is Senator Stephenson of Wisconsin whose election, it is charged by the State Senate Committee, was procured by corrupt practices. Senator Bourne of Oregon is another specimen of the kind of talent that comes to the surface in the cesspool of politics when the people have full swing, and few men are so ignorant of current history as to be unaware of the fact that he floated into the Senate on the pactolian stream that gushes from his mountain of stocks and bonds. What little experience of the new device for purifying politics that we have had so far has been sufficient to make it clear to normal perceptions that its tendency is not to discourage millionaire job-chasers. The probability is that if it ever comes into universal vogue it will do nothing more than increase the Bourne tribe at Washington.

Our Presidents

The only other argument advanced by Mr. Hearst in favor of the proposed amendment to the Constitution is with reference to the question of the ability of the people to choose good men. "If," he says, "the people are able to select the President, voting for him practically directly, why should the people not vote for their Senators?" The answer is of course that because the people are electing the Executive practically directly they should not extend the principle of absolute sovereignty to their legislature. If there were no other reason that ought to be sufficient, and for anybody sincerely eager to conserve the most important of all our national resources, that is our political institutions, and capable of understanding the primary elements of the science of government, that reason is sufficient. But there is still another answer to Mr. Hearst's question, the answer that the people have not shown that they are capable of electing their ablest and best qualified men to the Presidency. We have had twenty-five Presidents. How many of them from Monroe to Taft were men worthy of the high office? If there had been no Senate to serve as a check on them might we not long since have gone on the rocks? In several notable instances the people of this country yielding to appeals to their imagination and their feelings acted most unwisely, and they might have paid great penalties for their rashness had it not been for the checks and balances of power which the Founders contrived for them. The President of this country with the courts and the Senate to hold him in check is not able to do much damage, but with a Roosevelt in the White House and a Senate animated by the same motives that inspired his activities, or eager to supplant him in the affections of the mob, we should then have a situation abounding in potentialities for evil, and the apprehensions of even the most phlegmatic would be quickened.

An Old Tune

General de Noval (Translated by Andrew Lang)

There is an air for which I would disown
Mozart's, Rossini's, Weber's melodies;
A sweet sad air that languishes and sighs,
And keeps its secret charm for me alone.

Whene'er I hear that music vague and old,
Two hundred years are mist that rolls away;
The thirteenth Louis reigns, and I behold
A green land golden in the dying day.

An old red castle, strong with stony towers,
The windows gay with many colored glass;
Wide plains, and rivers flowing among flowers,
That bathe the castle basement as they pass.

In antique weed, with dark eyes and gold hair,
A lady looks forth from her window high;
It may be that I knew and found her fair,
In some forgotten life, long time gone by.

Perspective Impressions

A local clergyman has been sermonizing against the theatre. And yet the pulpit is becoming more theatrical every day.

An association of women in Boston asked the Legislature of Massachusetts to prohibit the wearing of tights on the stage. They have nothing to say about naked busts in the boxes.

Justices Angellotti, Shaw and Sloss appear to be of the opinion that Abe Ruef received a fair trial. Doubtless Judge Lawlor is chuckling at their credulity.

It was C. Cornelius Tacitus who said "When the State is most corrupt then the laws are most multiplied." And he never heard of California.

When a reformer seems to be unscrupulous it is because he is trying to render vice serviceable in the cause of virtue.

"This is the most important landing of a bird since the dove flew back to the ark," remarked Captain Pond of the Pennsylvania when Ely made his landing. How about the coming of the stork?

The Hon. "Battle Bob" La Follette of Wisconsin, the Hon. Gifted Pinchot of Pennsylvania and the Hon. Hippotades Johnson of California having organized the "Progressive League for the Protection of the Pee-pul," it goes without saying that now the country is saved.

Many of the thousand odd voters of Adams County, Ohio, who were indicted for selling their votes have pleaded in extenuation that they were hungry. Which goes to show that the motto "I must eat" is finding favor with the common people.

Correspondence

The Sovereign People

Editor Town Talk: It seems to me that the wholesale election frauds in Ohio and Illinois are an answer to the gentlemen who think that we can cure all our political ills by referring everything to the dear people and making all our servants directly responsive to the will of the people. To be sure these are but sporadic instances of the degeneracy of whole communities, but human nature is human nature, and it is frail and it yields to temptations. If there are whole electorates that cannot be bought at so much per capita they can at least be seduced by appeals to their selfish interests or deceived by artful demagogues. There are more ways of killing a cat than choking him with butter. But I didn't start out with the intention of moralizing. What I really want to say is that San Francisco is perhaps not so bad as it has been painted by the muckrakers. I wonder if the journalists and preachers who blackened the character of this city will now devote themselves to a psychological study of the Ohio township that bartered the elective franchise for filthy lucre!

Yours respectfully,

—A Reader.

The Spartan Idea

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Our most ready talker, President David Starr Jordan, has been telling us of the troubles of the Palo Alto university. I would suggest that this great man might advantage himself by practising humility and sitting for awhile at the feet of Professor Griffith of Berkeley. I don't know Professor Griffith, but I have been reading what he has had to say about the management of students, and I am convinced that he has ideas that are worth while to President Jordan. He says among other things "Unless you make the students feel the responsibility themselves no amount of prohibition you can impose will correct these tendencies to which Professor Jordan refers." The whole trouble at Palo Alto may be traced to the practice of keeping the students under suspicion and surveillance. They are treated as irresponsible children who have to be watched, and there is no incentive to the development of their better nature. Thus they are taught that the cardinal sin is to be found out. That was the Spartan idea. Its effect is to make youth cunning, not virtuous. Perhaps Dr. Jordan is a firm believer in the Spartan system, which of course is not without merit in a civilization somewhat different from our own.

Yours truly,

—Thomas Finch

The Easiest Way

Down in Bermuda Mark Twain made a speech about snakes to a group of little girls. The speech was great. The only trouble was that the little girls could not appreciate it. It flew over their heads. This was the humorist's conclusion:

"Never warm a serpent in your bosom. It is far easier to warm it by placing it under the pillow of an intimate friend."

VI—CHARLES DE YOUNG

By Edward F. O'Day

He is just about as tall as Napoleon but not nearly as stout, this Bonaparte of the newspaper world who wages his battles with printer's ink and slays ambitions with a blue pencil. He is a twentieth century Bonaparte of course, not too fiercely militant, by no means enamored of slaughter and not so reckless that he forgets at an time to conserve the resources which it would be wasteful to throw away. In other words he is Chronicle Napoleon, is Charles de Young, and has learned the Chronicle tradition which teaches that diplomacy is the better part of war and that peace hath her certain victories while the god of battle is notoriously fickle.

Behind one of the half-curtained windows of the Chronicle Building, just off Market street, there is a cosy little office with an oaken roll-top desk and a brace of telephones. There he sits while the crowd surges hither and thither outside, stopping occasionally to read the latest bulletin about our progress in this Panama Expedition fight, the sort of a fight he likes, a gentleman's fight with gentlemanly weapons and the stakes so large that there is no reason why anyone should become personal and lose his temper about it. He spends a lot of time in that cosy little office, does Charles de Young, more time than most millionaire sons of millionaire papas spend in their offices, and he is free to confess that he enjoys every minute of it. He takes his work very seriously, but after a young man's fashion, not afraid to lower his dignity by smoking his favorite Turkish cigarette as he signs a dozen checks, confers with the foreman of his press room or gives his views on the handling of a big news story.

He is a young man, a very young man; but how many young men of his years shoulder his responsibilities? How many Napoleons at twenty-one have controlled the fighting machine which sends into action every day? At half past eight or nine o'clock every morning, except Sunday, he is on the job and all day thereafter till six in the evening he stays with it, returning after dinner and sometimes not calling it a day till midnight has been dead for an hour. In five years he has had just two weeks' vacation, but he doesn't complain; he doesn't want a vacation. There is too much to do and he finds it so well worth the doing that he sees no reason to shunt the task onto somebody else. You see he is a real newspaperman; he stands the ultimate test—on Saturday which is a half-day to his millionaire friends is a day and a half for him.

Suppose Charles de Young is the most educated newspaperman in San Francisco. The educational process started in just as soon after his birth in the old family home in Powell street—the interesting occurrence was in June, 1881—just as soon after that as careful parents usually deem expedient. He was sent to the old Redding primary and thereafter to the Pacific Heights grammar. He was fourteen years old when he left the grammar school and went with his family to Europe. In Paris he attended the College de Ste. Croix conducted by the Brothers of the Holy Cross who taught him, among many other things, how to speak French with the accent of the boulevards. Then for a year he studied at a day school in Berlin where he absorbed more knowledge and put the real Unter Linden guttural twist on his German. The family returned home after that and he went to Belmont School to take his preliminary dip in the requirements for entrance to Harvard. There followed a year at the Exeter prep school in New Hampshire and being satisfactorily prepped by that time he matriculated at Harvard in 1901. In 1905 he bade farewell to President Eliot, both hands clasped lovingly about a neatly ribboned bachelor's degree and his brain cells stored with more intellectual honey than you could crowd into a five-foot shelf of India paper classics.

All through this long scholastic novitiate he had kept his eye on the horizon where the clock on the top of the tall red Chronicle Building—it had a clock on it in those days—seemed pointing to the hour when he was to become a journalistic Napoleon. He studied everything that might come in handy, specializing in English and history, but absorbing all sorts of useful knowledge. He even made a dab at geology which may or may not have something to do with the subsequent discovery of an artesian well under the Chronicle Building. But he had the good sense not to become a highbrow. He talks more shop than Shakespeare.

His career as a newspaper Napoleon began very modestly. Instead of training his guns on the Tuilleries he went behind the Chronicle counter and trained his attention on classified advertising, subscriptions and "stops" and complaints. He did a little soliciting, studied display advertising and at night hied him to the editorial and mechanical departments to watch the wheels go round. He was studying the newspaper game just as that other Harvard man, William Randolph Hearst, studied it in the old Examiner office in Sacramento street. The inference is that two men may study in the same way and learn two very different things.

Then the fire came and M. H. de Young was so busy attending to other interests that he decided to unload a lot of his journalistic burden on the young shoulders of his son. Charles was made business manager at the age of twenty-five which probably establishes a record for business managers of newspapers. But he is more than a mere business manager. You cannot limit a Napoleon to one part of the field; he must sweep it all. It would be more accurate to say that Charles de Young is the general manager of the Chronicle. He bosses the business and mechanical departments, but does not ignore the editorial end by any means. He is consulted by his staff of editors on all important stories and has a great deal to say about the proper method of handling them. So close is his touch with news that reporters even consult with him over the telephone when they are out pursuing it. And he reads all the papers through every day, rejoicing and commending when the Chronicle scores a beat, sorrowing and dodgast when the Chronicle is scooped, as is the way with all newspapermen in authority.

There is one branch about which he is eloquent and that is advertising. He has decided ideas about getting personality into it, making it sincere, convincing. He preaches the doctrine, which may seem strange to the uninitiate but not to newspapermen, that a merchant can advertise too much and he can give you very strong reasons for agreeing with him. He would rather talk about advertising than about George Bernard Shaw, although, come to think of it, the two subjects have a great deal in common.

Of course, Charles de Young's life is not all work. He likes the theater and does not eschew the Greenway dances, but the telephone operator always knows where to reach him and if a press breaks down or a big story is uncovered, he considers it no hardship to miss the fourth act or to cut the supper dance, with proper apologies, of course. So he is not really a society man. He is too busy and too interested in his business. He belongs to the San Mateo Polo Club, but has no time for polo; he belongs to the Marin Golf and Country Club, but can't spare time for the links; he belongs to the Union League, but is not a politician; he belongs to the Olympic Club, but seldom gets there. If he spends an occasional hour at the Bohemian Club or the Family, at the Press or the University, he considers that he has fulfilled his clubby obligations. But when the board of directors of the Panama-Pacific Exposition meets he is pretty sure to be there; and if we get the fair, just watch how active he will be on that important subcommittee in charge of publicity and exploitation.

Is he a successful man? Not having access to the balance sheets of The Chronicle I can not give you the figures, but I venture the assertion that during the last five years the paper has been doing very nicely, thank you. You see, he bears the name of one of the greatest newspapermen the West ever knew or ever will know, and he was not christened in vain. I don't think he is satisfied with The Chronicle yet—he has bigger plans for its future—but I know that his father is satisfied with him, proud of him, for M. H. de Young two years ago gave Charles an interest in the paper, an actual financial interest. Not yet thirty and nevertheless a conqueror of the sort of success which comes to most men later in life—what is the secret of it all? I think our young journalistic Napoleon tipped the secret when he told me: "Toil is no hardship when your heart is in it. You don't count the hours when you love your work."

We Build One Chinese Cruiser

Some time ago when Prince Tsai Hsun, the uncle of the infant Emperor of China and the head of the reorganized Chinese navy, arrived in this city with Admiral Sah, the brains of the Chinese navy, it was shouted from the rooftops that the Union Iron Works was to get the contract for building the Chinese navy. We were given to understand that the Prince and the Admiral would order their navy as a hungry man might order a steak. Now it turns out that one Chinese cruiser is to be built in this country. The contract has been let, not to the Union Iron Works, but to the New York Shipbuilding Company of Camden, New Jersey, which built the dreadnaughts Arkansas and Utah. The Chinese ship is to be a cruiser of the second class, to cost something over a million, and the Bethlehem Steel Company will supply the guns and armor. News of the contract which was kept secret by the shipbuilding concern, came to this country from Japan where it created a great deal of interest. Japan and England have hitherto monopolized the business of supplying China with ships of war. It is said that the awarding of the contract to the New York Shipbuilding Company came as a shock to another firm which was very assiduous in its attentions to the Prince and the Admiral last summer.

A Reformatory Near Mount Vernon

Unless public sentiment makes itself felt vigorously and without delay, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia will go ahead with their plan to establish in the neighborhood of Mount Vernon, the home of Washington, a reformatory for criminals. The Commissioners seem insensible to the impropriety of such a course. Ground in other parts of Virginia has been offered them, but so far without changing their purpose. They have the power to act and can only be checked by the intervention of Congress. They are displaying a callousness to hallowed historic associations which was not exhibited by the soldiers of the Civil War in the heat of that conflict. Soldiers of both armies respected Mount Vernon and there was no depredation committed there.

The Prohibition of Absinthe

Absinthe liquor is now prohibited in three European countries, Belgium, Holland and Switzerland. The dangers of absinthe were early known and denounced, but it is only in recent years that thought has been given to prohibiting this liquor. To Belgium belongs the honor of taking the lead. In 1905 its lower house voted the prohibition, which one year later was ratified by the upper chamber. As absinthe was drunk in only a few great cities, the prohibition in Belgium has rather the character of a preventive measure. The temperance people of Switzerland urge the complete prohibition of the manufacture, importation and sale of absinthe throughout the Swiss republic. Using their right of constitutional initiative, by means of a petition signed by 168,000 electors they demanded a vote on the question, and in spite of the opposition of the Government backed by the whole liquor party the prohibition was voted on July 5, 1908, by a large majority, and came in force on October 7, 1910. In Holland, where absinthe drinking has never prevailed to any considerable extent, prohibition was voted in 1910 as a preventive measure. There remains a great consumer of absinthe in Europe, France. Great but till now useless efforts were made to obtain prohibition by parliamentary enactment. Prohibitive measures, backed by Deputies and Senators of parties, were submitted but never discussed. A petition with 300,000 names was sent to the Chamber of Deputies, who, threatened by the clamors of the innkeepers, did not dare to interfere.

Has More Lives Than a Cat

It must be admitted once more that the Mullah of Somaliland, otherwise known as the "Mad Mullah," is not dead. How often this testy old gentleman may have read the affirmation or denial of his death with accompanying obituaries no one knows. Oftener, though, than any other man alive. Only a few months ago a report announced as final and definite his death at the hands of tribesmen and the hovering in consequence of a Somaliland peace over the whole country. Now comes the report that there is no peace and that the "Mad Mullah," with some 3,000 followers, is riding camel back, spreading false Moslem doctrines in the desert, and driving before him like sheep tribes friendly to Europeans. A great boon to his land is this Mullah, a patriot with so many hundred lives to offer up for his country.

Just a Few Duels

A large number of duels are to be fought at Nagyvarad, Hungary, as the result of a dispute about the costume worn by the president of the local Union of Solicitors at a ball. It appears that this gentleman attended a ball given by the Nagyvarad law students in a light blue summer suit and brown boots. The townsfolk who had been invited to the ball interpreted this costume as an insult aimed at them. A meeting of the law students, called to debate the question, was of a very stormy nature. One hundred and twenty-two "deadly insults," it is recorded, were offered, and are to be wiped out by a corresponding number of duels. The police had to break up the meeting. The duels are to be fought with swords.

British and American Juries

The exhausting of the fifth venire of fifty men without the securing of a single additional juror for a bribery case in Chicago gives special point to the contrast drawn between England and the United States in this respect by the American Law Review. In the Crippen case, two of the first twelve men called into the box were challenged by the defence, and two others took their places. That was all. No juror was asked a single question, and even the peremptory challenge of these two created a flutter in the court, it being very unusual to hear a challenge at the Old Bailey. In the Tichborne case, after a trial lasting over three months, the plaintiff lost, and was immediately arrested and charged with perjury. By that time the case had become an issue upon which England was divided. Yet the empanelling of the jury for the second trial took less than a quarter of an hour, one of the first twelve men called being excused, upon his own statement of bias, and another because he had been employed to make boxes for the Tichborne defence fund. The reason assigned by the Review for this indifference to the personnel of the jury and the general confidence in its fairness, is the absence of trial by newspaper. From the day the prosecution is begun until the verdict is rendered, a newspaper is not allowed to comment upon the evidence, or to express an opinion upon the innocence or the guilt of the prisoner. Three editors were punished for contempt of court in connection with the Crippen case. One had headed his offending article "Murderers Who Have Escaped." "That is a good beginning for an untried man," remarked the justice. Apparently, the English reverse our notion of the relative importance of judicial process and the regaling of the reading public.

Paul Verlaine's Son

George, the son of Paul Verlaine, was suddenly brought into notice the other day by being found unconscious, a poor guard, in the Paris underground railway. It was learned then that he, too, wrote verses, which, so his sudden eulogists allowed, he suppressed because he modestly refused to court comparison with his father. But it was quite wrong to say that George had never published poetry for fear of inviting comparison with his father. He has published poetry and he does invite the comparison. He has published, for instance, "A Woman's Tears." Here are the last two stanzas, translated:

To dry these salted springs,
Put many golden rings
On chubby hands, and see
If forgiven then you'll be.
Don't let her go so far As tragedy. Tears are Quite charming to behold,
If the lady'll be consoled.

The original of these lines is very little better than the translation.

Elias

By the Late Count Tolstoi (Translated by R. Nisbet Bain)

There dwelt once upon a time in the Ufimsk government a Bashkir named Elias. The father of Elias had left him a poor man. His father had only gotten him a wife a year before, and then died. In those days Elias owned seven mares, two cows, and twice ten sheep. But Elias was now the master, and began to spread himself out; from morn to eve he labored with his wife, rose up earlier and lay down later than all other men, and grew richer every year. Five-and-thirty years did Elias continue to labor, and won for himself great possessions.

Elias now had two hundred head of horses, a hundred and fifty head of horned cattle, and one thousand two hundred sheep. Many men-servants pastured the thuns and the herds of Elias, and many maid-servants milked the mares and the cows and made kumis, butter and cheese. Elias had much of everything, and everybody around about envied the life of Elias. People said: "Ah, what a lucky fellow that Elias is! He has everything in abundance, he has no need to toil." And good people began to know Elias and make his acquaintance. And guests came to him from afar. And Elias welcomed them all, and gave them to eat and to drink. Whosoever came to him found abundance of kumis, and tea, and sherbet, and the flesh of rams. Whenever guests came a ram or two was immediately killed, and if there were many guests they killed a mare.

Elias had three children—two sons and a daughter. Elias had provided his sons with wives, and had given his daughter in marriage. While Elias was poor his sons had worked with him and guarded the herds and the tabuns themselves, but when the sons became rich they began to amuse themselves, and one of them took to drink. One of them—the eldest—was presently killed in a brawl, and the younger son fell into the power of a stuck-up wife, and this son no longer listened to his father, and Elias had to give him his portion and get rid of him.

So Elias paid him out and gave him a house and cattle, and the riches of Elias were diminished. And shortly after this a disease fell upon the sheep of Elias, and many of them perished. And then came a year of scarceness—no hay would grow—and many cattle starved in the winter. Then the Kirghiz came and stole the best part of the horses, and the estate of Elias diminished still further. Elias began to fall lower and lower, and his natural forces were less. And when he had reached his seventieth year things came to such a pass that he began to sell his furs, his carpets, his kibitki, and then he began to sell his cattle, down to the very last one; and so Elias came to nought. And he himself perceived that he had nothing left, and he was obliged in his old age to go with his wife to live among the common people. And the only things which Elias could now call his own were the clothes he had on his body, his fur cloak, his hat, and his shoes; and his wife, Shem Shemagi, was also an old woman. The son whom he had bought off departed into a distant land, and his daughter died. And there was none to help the old folks.

Their neighbor, Muhamedshah, pitied the old folks. He himself was neither rich nor poor, but lived at his ease, and he was a good man. He remembered that he had eaten bread and salt with Elias, and he was filled with compassion and said to Elias:

"Come to me, Elias, and live with me along with thine old woman. In the summer thou shalt work for me according to thy strength in the melon fields, and in the winter thou shalt feed my cattle and let Shem Shemagi milk the cows and make kumis. I will feed and clothe you both, and whatever ye may want tell it me and I will give it you."

Elias thanked his neighbor and dwelt with his wife in the house of Muhamedshah as one of his servants. At first it seemed grievous to them, but soon they grew accustomed to it, and the old people continued to live there and work according to their strength.

It was profitable to the master to have such people, for the old folks had themselves been masters and knew how things should be rightly ordered, and were not idle but worked according to their ability; the only thing which grieved Muhamedshah was to see people who had been so high fall to such a low estate.

And it chanced one day that distant relations came as guests to Muhamedshah, and a Mullah came also. And Muhamedshah bade Elias take a ram and slay it. Elias skinned the ram and cooked it, and set it before the guests. The guests ate the ram's flesh, drank as much tea as they wanted, and then fell a-drinking kumis. The guests sat with their host on down cushions on the floor and drank their kumis out of little cups, and conversed together, and Elias went about his work and passed by the door where they were sitting.

Muhamedshah saw him and said to one of his guests: "Didst thou see that old man who passed by my door?"

"I saw him," said the guest; "is there anything extraordinary about him?"

"There is this much extraordinary about him—that he was once upon a time our richest man—Elias they called him; perchance thou hast heard concerning him?"

"How could I help hearing of him?" replied the guest; "seen it all I have not, but the fame of him was spread far and wide."

"Well, now he has nought, and he lives with me as a servant, and his old woman lives with him and milks my cows."

The guest was astonished. He clicked with his tongue, shook his head, and said: "Ah! 'tis plain how fortune goes flying round like a wheel. One she raises on high, another she thrusts down below. Tell me," said the guest, "is the heart of the old man sore within him, perchance?"

"Who can tell? He lives peaceably and quietly, and looks well."

"May one converse with him?" said the guest; "I should like to question him concerning his life."

"Certainly, it is possible," replied the host, and he shouted from behind the kibitka, "Babad," which signifies grandfather in the Bashkir language, "go and drink kumis and call hither the old man!"

And Elias came to them with his wife. Elias greeted the guests and the host, recited a prayer, and squatted down on his knees at the door, and his wife went behind the curtain and sat down with her mistress.

They gave Elias a cup full of kumis. Elias drank the healths of the guests and the host, did obeisance, drank a little more, and then placed the cup aside.

"Now, tell me, grandfather," said one of the guests, "I suppose it grieves thee looking at us, to call to mind thy former life, and to recollect how fortunate thou wert, and how now thou dwellest in misery?"

And Elias smiled and said: "If I were to speak to thee of good fortune and illfortune thou wouldst not believe me—far better it would be if thou didst ask my old wife concerning this thing. She is a woman, and therefore what her heart feelth that her tongue speaketh; she will tell thee the whole truth about this matter."

And the guest spake, turning towards the curtain: "Speak now, old woman! tell me, how judgest thou concerning thy former good fortune and thy present ill fortune?"

And Shem Shemagi answered from behind the curtain: "This is how I judge: I and my old man lived together for fifty years; we sought after happiness and we could not find it, and only now this is the second year in which we have wanted for nothing, and we live as working folks and have found real happiness, and we want nothing else."

The guests were astonished and the host was astonished; he even rose up and threw aside the curtain to behold the old woman. And there the old woman stood with folded arms, and she was smiling, and she looked at her old man, and he smiled also.

And the old woman also said: "I speak the truth, I jest not: we sought happiness for half a hundred years, and while we were rich we did not find it at all; now that we have nothing left and live among working people we have found such happiness that we need nothing better."

"And in what, then, does your present happiness consist?"

"It consists in this: while we were rich I and my old man had not a single quiet hour together, we had no time to talk, no time to think of our souls, no time to pray to God. So many cares were we saddled with. At one time guests came to see us, and it was a worry what to set before each and with what presents to gratify them lest they should speak scornfully concerning us. Then there was the trouble of seeing to it that the wolves did not rend the lambs or kids or that thieves did not chase away the horses. Even when we lay down it was not to sleep, for we feared that the sheep might overlay the lambs in the night. You might get up and go about at night, and no sooner would your mind be at ease than a fresh worry would arise: how to find hay or pasture in the winter time—and so it would go on. And all this was nothing to the disagreements between my old man and me. He would say: 'We ought to do this,' and then I would say: 'No! we ought to do that!' and so we began to curse each other, and that was sinful. Thus we lived, and went on from care to care, from sin to sin, and we found no happiness in life."

"Well, but now?"

"Now I and my old man rise up together, we converse lovingly and agree in all things, we have nought to quarrel about and nought to trouble us—our sole care is to serve our master. We labor according as we are able, we labor gladly, so that our master may have no loss and may prosper. We come to the house—there is dinner, there is supper, there is kumis. If it be cold there is the kizyak wherewith to warm our-

John Martin's Luck

John Martin of San Francisco and Ross, president of the Coast Counties Light and Power Company, one of the big concerns in the local power field, is no doubt willing to concede that he is a very lucky man. Martin went east a few days ago on various matters of business, among which is the placing of orders for the furnishing of Fred Swanton's new hotel on the Santa Cruz beach, for Martin is backing Swanton in that enterprise. But before he went away he told a very interesting story of his luck. Years ago Martin acquired a controlling interest in the South Eureka Mine of Sutter County. For the last ten years Martin, in common with the other stockholders, has been paying assessments and reaping absolutely no dividends. Regarding the property as an impossible one, Martin tried two years ago to sell it, offering his stock for three cents a share; but as there was a two cent assessment on it, there were no takers. He couldn't get rid of it, so he held on. Recently there has been unusual activity in the South Eureka Mine. It began to look to Martin as though there might be something doing. And there was. All of a sudden the miners struck rich ore and the South Eureka Mine began turning out a stream of gold. At the present time John Martin's income from the property is $40,000 a month. Of course, that may not last, but it has already lasted long enough to prove that the goddess of luck is smiling on John Martin.

And the Druggist's Luck

There is a humble druggist in this city who owns stock in that South Eureka Mine. During the ten years of assessment after assessment this druggist held on to his stock, hoping against hope that the time would come when he would be rewarded for his patience. It was a struggle for this man of pills and potions to pay his assessments, but he managed to keep on paying them until a short time ago. An assessment of a few cents was levied and the druggist gave up in despair. He let John Martin know that he couldn't pay and that he was going to give up his stock. Martin knew how steadfastly this druggist had held on year after year; he also knew or thought he knew that the mine was to have a turn of luck. So he sent a letter to the druggist in which he advised him in the most emphatic terms to hold on to his stock by paying the assessment at any sacrifice. The druggist took the advice. The result is that the mine is now paying him an income of $300 a month.

A Local Triumvirate

From an authoritative source I learn that a new political combination has been formed for the coming campaign, the purpose of which is reciprocity in job-chasing. The combination is the old-fashioned triumvirate, the precedent for which was established in ancient Rome by the talented J. Caesar, the Hon. M. Lucinius Crassus and the ambitious C. Pompey. The Caesar of the San Francisco triumvirate is Mayor P. H. McCarthy, and his associates are the Hon. Charles Curry and the Hon. Fred Eggers. The Mayor is to stand for re-election, Curry is to run for Assessor and Eggers is to run for Sheriff. On paper the combination looks strong, but how it will look on election day is another matter. The people have a disagreeable habit of upsetting the best laid plans of mice and politicians. For the present the new combination is of interest only by reason of its significance with reference to the relations of one job-chaser to another. If McCarthy has decided to back Eggers for Sheriff it is evident that Tom Finn who is now rendering service to the people in the capacity of Senator as well as in the capacity of Sheriff has cut loose from the local Administration. This is not surprising in view of the reputed combination between the Sheriff and the purest of his sex, the Chief Magistrate of the State.

Johnson's Ambition

Governor Johnson, by the bye, is reported to be wedded irrevocably to his new career. I am told that the fascination of office has him in thrall, that the virus of politics has surged through all his system, and that his case is hopeless. According to some of his admirers the Senate of his country is now the goal of his ambition, and as there is said to be a way of evading the Constitutional provision prohibiting a Governor from becoming a candidate for Senator he may be found appealing to the suffrages of his dear friends, the people, at the expiration of Senator Perkins' term. If such be the Johnson state of mind great impetus will be given to the Progressive movement in California, for there are several patriots eager to go to Washington and physic the degenerate body politic, all of whom will doubtless feel that the Governor should stay at Sacramento if for no other purpose than to give the Octopus the hell that it deserves. But if Johnson really wants to go to the Senate he is not likely to wait four years. With all the sublime confidence he has in himself he is not to be deluded into the notion that he can govern the State for four years and retain his prestige to the bitter end. Not at any rate with Pardee as an awful example before him constantly trying to "come back."

The Artist and the Judge

"Virgie" Nahl, the newspaper artist, experienced a rude shock in Judge Graham's court the other day, to which no reference has been made by any of my contemporaries. Nahl appeared in Judge Graham's court on a business matter of the most vital importance. As a rule business is not of the slightest consequence to Mr. Nahl, for he is a typical artist, bubbling over with artistic temperament. But on this occasion the transaction engaging his attention concerned him deeply. He was making arrangements for a new deal in matrimony, and certain pecuniary questions were up for settlement. Nahl was laboring under the delusion that when a man experiences the atavistic impulse to make a change in his domestic affairs it is his privilege to take at least half the community property and call it square. In proposing to do that much for his wife he considered himself quite generous. Not so Judge Graham. On the trial of the case it was shown that the man with the artistic temperament had not proved himself an ideal husband. The evidence was all in favor of Mrs. Nahl, a woman of much forbearance. So Judge Graham granted Mrs. Nahl the decree of divorce. The community property consisted of a home worth $10,000 and $12,250 in cash. Judge Graham awarded Mrs. Nahl the home and $8,250 in coin of the realm. And yet he did not feel that he had given Mrs. Nahl a square deal. To make it as near square as possible he ordered "Virgie" Nahl to pay Mrs. Nahl eighty dollars a month alimony. Thus did "Virgie" learn that the artistic temperament which is usually accompanied by an eager eye for the beautiful is an expensive luxury.

Joan Hadenfeldt That Was

It rather surprises me to learn that Mrs. Joan Hadenfeldt Woodbury is devoting herself to the difficult business of writing plays and songs. The news comes from New York, where the beautiful Joan is now living, her husband being a hot keeper in the metropolis. It seems that she has already written one song which had a vogue on Broadway, several sketches for the vaudeville circuits and a musical drama entitled "Zun Queen of the Incas." This was produced, seems, in Los Angeles for the benefit of some charitable institution and brought in a handsome sum. It is interesting to learn that Mrs. Woodbury will put all the money which she earns from her plays and songs into a ranch in Sonoma County. I sincerely hope that the Sonoma County ranch may wax fat on the profits of art; but might be well to remind Mrs. Woodbury that the profits of play writing and song writing are a hazardous, elusive and often very small. It pleases me to have something to chronicle about this interesting woman, for she has shunned publicity since her marriage and her very fascinating personality has been a good deal obscured.

Her Colorful Career

There was a time when the names of Joan and Wanda Hadenfeldt were very familiar to the readers of the local papers. Their father, Charles Hadenfeldt, was an old-time wholesale jeweler who supplied them with plenty of money for the gratification of their diverse whims. Joan was a brunette beauty of Junoesque proportions, while Wanda was blonde and slender; together they made a fetching picture and they were fond of being photographed together. When Carville was in the height of its popularity, the two girls purchased a car and with their own hands turned it into a cosy retreat which was the showplace of the lower beach. Joan was a favorite subject for the artists, and Clawson, Cadenasso and Jouillin transferred her loveliness to canvas. She

Joan Hadenfeldt always had a hankering for the footlights and there was quite a stir in her circle when it was announced that she was to join the James Neill company. But a severe attack of "les pieds" intervened and she never tried the legitimate stage. Later, however, she summoned the courage to enter vaudeville and under the name "Joan Haden" toured the Orpheum Circuit with more or less success in a spectacular act called "The Four Seasons of Love."

The Death of Aspden

Whatever Joan Hadenfeldt did—and she did little that had not at least a touch of the spectacular in it—was sedulously and lengthily set before the readers of the Sunday supplements until her pictures became very familiar. Then one day the town was treated to a great sensation. George Aspden, who was the Sunday editor of the Call and who had previously been a Sunday supplement writer for The Examiner, committed suicide, giving as the reason for the act Joan Hadenfeldt's indifference to his love. The letter which George Aspden penned before destroying himself was one of the most touching of the kind I have ever read. It fairly burned with unquenchable passion. For the first time the town learned that George Aspden, in his great love for Joan Hadenfeldt, had been responsible for most of the publicity which she received. It was he who had prepared her vaudeville act and designed the wonderful costumes which set off her beauty. She was still on the circuit when Aspden saw fit to bring a brilliant journalistic career to its untimely close.

Cedar Rapids and Prague

In the cast of "The Chocolate Soldier" are two players well known in San Francisco. One of them is Frank Belcher who several years ago bade farewell to the clubs in which he was a favorite to make a name for himself on the stage and who returns a splendid musical comedy singer. The other is Miss Antoinette Kopetsky. The name of Antoinette Kopetsky is not a familiar one and at first blush that is not surprising. Her press agents have heralded her as a member of an old Bohemian family prominent in Prague; they have told us that she came to this country at the age of eight years; and they have added impressively that her father was attached to the Austrian legation at Washington. This is an interesting story but lacking in vraisemblance. As a matter of fact Antoinette Kopetsky was for several seasons at the old Tivoli where she bore her real name of Anna Schaetz up to the time that she became the wife of "Jack" Wilson of the Press Club. She had come to San Francisco from San Diego where her father was engaged in business. Instead of being born in the "beautiful city of Prague" she was born in Cedar Rapids, Iowa. The press agents have given this Chocolate prima donna a gingerbread genealogy.

A Rehearing for Ruef

So Abe Ruef is to have another opportunity to argue the proposition that he did not receive a fair trial at the hands of Judge Lawlor! There are many good citizens who think it an outrage that the Supreme Court should give ear to the pleading of so arrant a scoundrel as Abe Ruef. He has kept out of jail so long that they believe he is adding to his many crimes by making a mockery of justice. Occasionally one hears expressed the sentiment that everybody knows that Ruef deserves to be put in stripes, and as the Courts need have no fear of doing him injustice by sending him to the penitentiary they should not permit him to stay the logical course of events with technical obstructions. This is a most plausible and persuasive sentiment. But it embodies a most vicious principle. It puts expediency above law. As desirable as it is to send Ruef to jail it is far more important that our courts should see that strict justice be done. For when we deny justice even to the worst of criminals we are very unjust to ourselves. Of course, it is not desirable for our courts to resolve every little technicality in favor of Ruef. We ought only to expect them to deal out to him substantial justice. We should have no objection to their stretching a point against him, but we should object to their ignoring the most obvious of fundamental principles and the erecting of dangerous and vicious precedents. Indeed if it should be made clear to us that judicial officers have been guilty of infamous conduct in their efforts to make the acquittal of a scoundrel impossible, then our indignation at their behaviour ought to transcend all other emotions. For the administrator of justice who commits a crime to punish a man charged with crime is the most vicious of all rascals. Now the Ruef case, in my opinion, presents an aspect that concerns us far more deeply than the fate of the central figure, and that aspect I will try to make cognizable to every reader.

The Proprieties of Prosecution

The aspect I have reference to is the one which the Supreme Court has been called upon to scrutinize. It is composed of the features of the trial conducted by Judge Lawlor. Not all of those features will the Supreme Court be permitted to inspect; only those revealed by the record. The mob that attended the trial and contributed to the atmosphere, the frowns of the knitters, the police protection that betrayed a sense of fear of public violence and numerous other physical circumstances that gave an exceptional tone to the trial—these features are not to be reproduced, though for indicating the character of the proceedings they would be far more eloquent than the whole transcript of verbiage. But the printed record is sufficient for my purpose; nay, a few excerpts will do—just a few from the speech to the jury of the prosecutor, a distinguished gentleman who now occupies the office of Governor of this State. By way of preface to these excerpts, I will first remind my readers that as well recognized as the principle of the impartiality of the judge is the principle of the impartiality of the prosecuting attorney. Every lawyer knows that according to maxims of the law supported by innumerable authorities and rendered equivocal by none, it is reversible error for a prosecuting attorney to declare to the jury his belief that an accused person on trial is guilty, or to make remarks calculated to prejudice the minds of the jury, or to vilify a defendant, or to appeal to the fears or vanity of the jury. A prosecuting attorney who deliberately does any of these things is hardly to be considered a self-respecting or conscientious individual. When in addition to doing any of these things a prosecuting officer distorts the truth to the injury of an accused person with the judge on the bench all the while complaisant, we then have a somewhat anomalous performance which in some circumstances easily conceivable might be demoralizing to the man in the dock. For the man in the dock might have clean hands. The man in the dock might have come into court with respect for the blind goddess. Now perhaps it would be better were the prosecuting attorney given more latitude. I will not argue to the contrary, though I am in no doubt as to the wisdom of the restrictions of the law. All that I wish to make clear is that the law regulating the conduct of judge and prosecuting officer is unequivocal and well understood, and that if it should be flagrantly violated, that is, violated ruthlessly and in all essentials without scruple, and with apparent vindictiveness, whether in the case of an innocent man or in the case of the meanest of rogues, then it would be both cowardly and criminal for a justice of the Supreme Court to shirk the responsibility of averting the consequences.

His Philippic

Now for the excerpts from the speech of Mr. Hiram Johnson, who, as we have since learned, was not working for the prosecution for his health or merely for civic righteousness. He professed to have volunteered in this case, and perhaps he did, but it doesn't matter, for whatever his exact status these are some of his utterances:

"If you don't convict this man, may the good God in his infinite mercy or worse call upon you the consequences of your act. If when he pleads himself guilty, as he has in this case, you dare to violate your oaths and say he is not guilty, may the good God deal with you, because, by heaven, the people will not."

"Dare you acquit this man? Dare you? And when we have finished I will ask you again, my friends."

"He is guilty. Oh, yes; we know it."

"Good God, all this blood that has been shed."

"Men struck down doing their duty."

"All this trial, trouble, tribulation; all this blood."

"Away with the assassins."

"There he stands (pointing to the defendant); there he stands self-confessed; stands with the plea of guilty upon his lips."

"Good God; all this time, all this money, all this blood that has been shed."

"If you dare violate your oaths and say he is not guilty, may the good God deal with you."

"The civic battle is on."

"There is going to be no shifting of responsibility in this determination."

"They do not ask you a single thing except 'acquit, acquit, acquit.' Why? Because Ruef has so much money; that is all. Because he can distribute it in certain ways; but, thank God, we know how it is to be distributed."

"Are you afraid to convict him? Is your honesty of such a stripe and your manhood of such a character that when self-confessed he comes to your bar and says 'I am a felon. I did confess,' are you in the face of that to turn him loose and tell him to go hence? And if you are ready to do it, by the Gods above, we will know the reason why you are ready to do it."

The foregoing minatory shrieks are from a certified copy of the record.

The Merits of the Speech

To realize the significance of the Johnson philippic one must recall that throughout the trial the jury was in custody and had no knowledge of the state of public sentiment. Francis J. Heney had been shot down in the presence of the jury, and naturally the jury which knew nothing of the facts might have supposed that the people believed that Ruef instigated the shooting and were wrought up to a high pitch of indignation. We see how Mr. Johnson, who is now Governor, honored and respected by the people, took adroit advantage of the situation. We see how he sought to intimidate the jury, how he hinted that if they failed to convict it would be assumed that they had been bribed. We see that he spoke of Ruef's confession; yet Ruef had not confessed to the crime for which he was being tried, nor to a crime at all similar. We see that he intimated that Ruef was responsible for the shooting of Heney, which was the worst thing that ever happened to Ruef, and for a very obvious reason more deeply deplored by Ruef than any other living creature on God's earth. It was a very effective speech that Johnson delivered, and it was unique, too; nothing like it is to be found in all the annals of the criminal courts of America. It would perhaps be impossible to find in the legal profession another man capable of delivering such a speech. I doubt whether Ruef, were the situation reversed, and the fee very large, would deliver such a speech. But now the question remains: Was it necessary? Might not Ruef have been convicted by orderly and decent, as well as due, process of law?

Jordan's Incomplete Demurrer

Dr. David Starr Jordan is again complaining that the newspapers have attributed to him statements that he never made. And Dr. Jordan has summoned that eminent sociologist and patriot, the Hon. Charles Wesley Reed, as witness to give testimony as to what was said on a certain occasion. As Mr. Reed is neither a stenographer nor celebrated for his retentive memory I am not inclined to accept his testimony as conclusive of the unveracity of the reporters. Yet one may accept it without tending to exonerate Dr. Jordan from an embarrassing situation. For the things which according to Mr. Reed were not said are inconsequential compared with one thing which remains on the record. Dr. Jordan was represented as having said that Professor Ross in his booklet "Honest Dollars" asserts that the money of the university was stolen property being returned to the people. Professor Ross characterizes this assertion as baseless. "The booklet," he says, "contains no reference to any university." Professor Ross adds: "The statement about Japanese immigration attributed to me is a caricature of what I said. I discussed the subject only because Dr. Jordan gave my name to the committee of speakers for the mass-meeting."

Now in view of the fact that all the recent trouble at Stanford has been due to Dr. Jordan's zeal for some of the moralities, would it not be interesting to learn what he thinks of the kind of offense with which he is implicitly charged by Professor Ross?

Does Nat Believe in Signs?

"The last time I saw Nat Goodwin," said a San Franciscan who recently returned from a pleasure trip to New York, "he was standing before a plate glass window on Broadway. His gaze was intent and his face showed the marks of deepest melancholy. I stopped and followed his line of vision. In gilt letters on the window I read the ominous words, 'Goodrich Tires.' I wonder if old Nat believes in signs?"

Barry on the Bema

Richard Barry, the young San Francisco journalist, who made a quick trip to Japan at the opening of the war with Russia and a quick return to this country with material which enabled him to break into the magazine world where he has been luxuriating ever since, is now attracting attention to himself by leading a campaign against woman's suffrage in New York. He lectured on the subject at the Lyceum Theater one day last week and was almost mobbed by indignant women. "This is the worst I ever heard," said Mrs. "Ollie" Belmont after the lecture. "Some of the finest women in the country are in the suffrage States, and he has insulted them all. I am a Southern woman, but the thing makes my blood boil. If there had been a Western man present he would undoubtedly have wrung the neck of the man whom those women applauded." The women referred to by Mrs. Belmont were members of the National League for the Civic Education of Women, under whose auspices the meeting was held, and their sympathizers. They occupied about two-thirds the orchestra chairs. Suffragists listened from the gallery. Mrs. Annie Nathan Meyer introduced the speaker and announced that there would be no opportunity for questions after the lecture, but that if any one wished further information regarding any of the points touched upon by Mr. Barry it could be obtained by addressing him at the office of a magazine. The arrangement apparently did not suit the Rev. Anna Shaw, for when the curtain began to descend at the conclusion of Mr. Barry's remarks she rose and called, "Mrs. Meyer! Mrs. Meyer! But the curtain kept on going down, leaving the theater in darkness for a moment, and Mrs. Meyer made no response. "Well, at any rate that liar will be answered tomorrow at our mass meeting at the Broadway Theater!" exclaimed Miss Shaw, as she went away.

His Offensive Statements

During his lecture Mr. Barry said that woman's suffrage was an accident in Wyoming, introduced through the efforts of one John Bright, an ex-Confederate soldier, in an exuberance of gratitude to a certain "Mother Morris," who took care of his wife and infant son while he was in the army on legislative duty. "It was a Populist measure in Colorado," he continued, "and a Mormon whip in Utah and Idaho." The laws regarding child labor and those limiting the working hours of women were, he said, less favorable to the classes affected in the suffrage States than in those in which women didn't vote. suffrage had neither diminished illiteracy of children nor raised the wages of women relatively to those of men, he said, and added that he had learned from statistics and the statements of persons in a position to speak authoritatively that the divorce was on the increase in Colorado and likewise alcoholism among women. He was loudly applauded when he said that Salt Lake City was unique among the cities of America for having polygamy in its fashionable section and at the other end of town a group of cottages enclosed by a stone wall eighteen feet high, the cottages being occupied by women of ill repute. Another burst of applause came when he said that so far as he could find out the only laws passed in the four States for which women were responsible were one in Utah which involved a sentence of six months in a penitentiary for wearing a hat in a theater, another in Colorado which imposed a penalty for killing doves in August and a third, also in Colorado, which raised the age of consent for girls to 18 years. "This law was repealed later," said Mr. Barry, "because it resulted in so much blackmail." Mr. Barry concluded his lecture by saying that there was strong reason to believe that woman suffrage would be taken off the statute books in Colorado in the near future.

Ms. Beckman's Book

So many of our social celebrities promise to write books and never reach fulfillment of their promises that when a woman of social distinction brings out a volume, it is entitled to more than passing mention, independently of its intrinsic merit. That is why I call attention to "Beckie's Book of Bastings" which has just come, in a dress of buckram, from the press of Joseph N. Anderson, a Sacramento printer. "Beckie" is Mrs. William Beckman, probably the best known woman in the capital city. She is the wife of the president of the People's Bank and for the past thirty years has occupied a commanding position in Sacramento society. It is only because the inclination was lacking that she did not become the social arbitress of her community. Mrs. Beckman prefers more solid distinction. This is the third book which has come from her pen. The first was "Backsheesh"; the second was entitled "Unclean and Spotted from the World." The latter was a novel which excited something of a sensation, not purely literary, at the time of its publication. It was what the reviewers dub "a rather warm story" and it embodied a collection of love letters of quite a torrid temperature. It was the love letters that created the sensation for it speedily became known that they were the authentic heart throbs of a great celebrity in the history of California. It was even whispered who had been the recipient of these ardent epistles and there was a great deal of curiosity as to the manner in which they had passed from the possession of this fair Incognita to the hands of Mrs. Beckman. In her latest book Mrs. Beckman has gathered together a fugitive collection of wise saws, bits of sprightly philosophy, sage reflections and clever epigrams. Her pages indicate that Mrs. Beckman has observed life with a kindly eye and a mind open to all sorts of impressions. In her philosophy charity and liberality are predominant; the joy of life is stamped on all her musings. "Beckie's Book of Bastings" mirrors an interesting personality.

A Cheap Senator

They are still talking in Sacramento about the various considerations, big and little, which induced legislators morally obligated to Spalding to cast their votes for Judge Works. One of these stories concerns a senator who was bought very cheap. This senator needed fifty cents a day to eke out the salary of a youngster he was trying to put on the payroll as a page. He went to another senator and asked him for the trifling per diem of patronage, but the other senator had used up all his patronage and had to refuse. But one of the Works boomers learned of the situation. He went to the troubled senator and asked him if he needed help. The senator replied that he did and was very pointedly asked whether he would appreciate it. He said that he would. So he was instructed to go to Senator Lee Gates of Los Angeles, ask for the fifty cents a day and tell who sent him. The page was put on the payroll and the senator voted for the choice of the Lissner machine.

"The Mixed Drinks Editor"

There is at least one woman in town who thinks that the staff of the Examiner embodies omniscience. She is convinced that no question is a poser to the paper's multitudinous editors. And she has no doubt that the Examiner has a "Mixed Drinks Editor." This woman rang up the city editor of the Examiner a few evenings ago and sweetly inquired, "Can you please tell me how to make a Tom and Jerry?" Assistant city editor Charles Coleman who was "on the job," was puzzled for a minute, but only for a minute. "Certainly, madam," he answered; and then to the exchange operator, "Connect this lady with Mr. Jack Ryan, our mixed drinks editor." The exchange operator is Miss Kate Lynch who is experienced in the ways of city editors and assistant city editors. She did as she was asked and Mr. Jack Ryan gave the fair inquirer the prescription for which she asked. Mr. Jack Ryan, be it understood, is the night bartender at the Springfield Saloon which is across the street from the Examiner office and a very popular resort with editors and reporters.

Nip Tradition I' the Bud

College traditions die hard; but many of them are nipped in the bud. There are certainly few more charming and interesting traditions in any American university than that of the senior flower committee at Stanford. Established several years ago, it will undoubtedly die only with the college itself. Every semester two members of the senior class—a man and a maid—are selected to keep fresh flowers daily on the mausoleum which contains the remains of the founders of the university. Every day during the college year the memory of Senator and Mrs. Stanford is thus kept fresh in the minds of the students of the university. And every day the committee meets in the eucalyptus grove surrounding the Stanford mausoleum on its mission of loyalty. Truth is often an imitator of fiction. Another charming and romantic young tradition has sprung up along with that of the flower committee. It has only lately been discovered, although sentimental Stanfordites should have looked for it as the inevitable result of the appointment of a committee of two—a man and a maid—to perform rather a sentimental journey. Cupid started the second tradition; engagements have come to be a common outcome of each flower committee; and nearly every one has resulted in a marriage. But just now, sad as it seems, there is a possibility that his Stanford tradition, like many other far less romantic, may be nipped in the bud by certain young ladies who have refused to follow the dictates of custom and of Cupid.

Cut Out Prexy's Son

Last year Miss Maybelle Barlow, a stunning Los Angeles girl and a prominent member of the exclusive Kappa Alpha Theta Sorority, was appointed along with Knight Jordan, son of no less a personage than the president of the university, to keep fresh flowers on the Stanford tomb. Now "Twinklestar," as Stanford wags irreverently love to call the son of Dr. Jordan, followed every step of the new-born tradition, according to those who record the romances of the quad. Miss Barlow was motored about the countryside by her fellow committeeman in Dr. Jordan's '06 Peerless (during the president's absences). There was every evidence—say the sentimentalists—that the new college tradition would be supported and strengthened by the Barlow-Jordan flower committee regime. But the year and the committee came to an end, much to the disappointment of "Twinklestar," it is whispered. Despite an awe-inspiring handicap, a younger classman entered the race, caught up to the Jordan Peerless, threw traditions to the winds, won the flower-committee Theta, quit college and went south to accept a position with Barlow pere, who is prominent in the southern city. The youth, who is now being gossiped about on the quad as "the fellow who cut Twinklestar out," is Tudor H. A. Tiedemann of Alameda. Tiedemann is a Phi Kappa Psi boy and the son of P. J. A. Tiedemann of Alameda. He was active in Stanford athletics. The engagement has just been announced.

New Worlds to Conquest

Clare Payne is off to Europe in quest of fresh adventures, of the kind, I suppose, that delighted the hero of the Sentimental Journey. And yet if all tales be true that come pouring into my coy, reluctant ear this young man "can travel from Dan to Beersheba and cry 'Tis all barren.'" For Clare Payne is one of our fastest youths and a devil among the skirted sex. For one so young he has some notable achievements to boast of, and because so young he does not hide the light of his triumphs under a bushel. A frank, ingenuous young man is Clare Payne, of a strange personality, as I have learned since his departure, for he is being much talked of these days. He is the absorbing topic of social gossip which, by the way, has been reduced to whispers.

Maxine on the Coast

During her previous visits to this city Miss Maxine Elliott was the pet of the smart set. Hostesses vied with one another in extending to her lavish hospitalities. The doors of exclusiveness opened to her as they opened to no other actresses except Ethel Barrymore and Mrs. Pat Campbell. I have no doubt that the smartest of our hostesses are still perfectly willing to entertain Miss Elliott. I presume that she has not seen fit to accept their invitations. Perhaps she has tired of the glitter of society and longs for more exciting diversions. However that may be, I have no social doing of Miss Elliott to chronicle and must content myself with mentioning that on last Saturday night she paid a visit, in company with a party of friends, to the Barbary Coast. It was a very quiet visit, for Miss Elliott is easily recognized and the indiscriminate homage which the crowd is always eager to pay to her beauty is distasteful to her. So she kept as much as possible in the background. But she saw what was worth while seeing on the Coast. She studied the "turkey trot," as Pavlowa had studied it, in its native wild; she heard the spieler urging the backward sailor and the bashful soldier to the consumption of more beer; she watched the sirens of the district lavishing their wiles upon longshoremen and coalheavers; and she saw the Salome dance. It was, I presume, a very interesting evening for Miss Elliott, more interesting than some which she has spent in the midst of our most exclusive parochial aristocracy.

Lines to Maxine

I wonder if Miss Elliott still keeps a scrap-book which she used to show to her friends in the days gone by. It was in those earlier days when she was the adored of one and all of the Johnnies that she conceived the idea of pasting their mash notes in a big scrap-book. The book bulged rapidly, and when I last heard of it 'twas a bulky volume indeed. Some of the names signed to those notes, by the way, would cause embarrassment to their owners if they were published today.

MISS MURIEL CATHERINE TURNER

Whose engagement to Mr. Thomas Boardman Smith was recently announced. Both are graduates of the University of California and prominent in fraternity and sorority circles.

The book was not devoted entirely to mash notes. Many of Maxine's friends contributed verses to vary its monotony. A clever versifier of this city contributed the following:

"They say you have a scrap-book, fair Maxine,
More divine than any chap-book, fair Maxine,
Full of songs and roundelays
That were written in your praise,
For in truth you're quite the craze,
Sweet Maxine.

"You have set my heart on fire, tall Maxine,
But there are others who are prior, my Maxine,
Else till now I'd not have tarried
Ere to you my love I carried,
But the fact is, I am married, Loved Maxine.

Why the Czar Didn't Dance

At the last Greenway assembly, which, by the way, was one of the most brilliant and most enjoyable of the season, a matron noticed that the Czar was not dancing. She asked him why and he explained that he was being kept too busy serving the persons who were present without invitations. By actual count he found that there were fifteen men and women in the ballroom who had not received cards, but who were evidently deterred by that circumstance from availing themselves of the privileges usually enjoyed only by members of the club and those who had been formally bidden as guests. Mr. Greenway found that one girl had brought three men to the ball without subjecting herself to the usual formalities. So he issued an edict that for every offense of the sort in the future he would impose a fine of twenty dollars.

Manor's Local Counterpart

Can Miss Evelyn Cunningham have we a local Eleanor Sears? At the aviation meet last week Miss Cunningham might have been taken for the dashing Eleo. She was garbed in the characteristic mannish manner and wore that look of absorbed interest in the sport that is seen in pictures of Miss Sears. Her companion was Jack Hoffman and they were chaperoned by the young lady's mother, Mrs. Athearn Folger. Miss Cunningham's costume was far from beautiful, but it was picturesquely mannish. An ample box overcoat of black and white tweed enveloped her figure and on her head was a small man's hat of the same material, the brim pulled down all around, and devoid of trimming. Across one shoulder was hanging the black leather strap of her field glasses. Her hair was drawn tightly back into the braids Miss Sears affects, and the whole effect was one of an unheralded visitation of the Boston belle. Miss Cunningham is to make her debut next winter. She is heiress to the Luning millions through her mother, who was a daughter of old John Luning, and sister of Mrs. George Whittell. Mrs. Fife is another sister, but she has never been conspicuous in the set with which Mrs. Folger and Mrs. Whittell are identified. The young lady is also a cousin of the Cunningham girls of New York, who spent last spring in San Francisco.

The Psychology of a Fiance

George Mullen who is to wed Miss Olga Atherton, is a man of intellectual attainments and tastes. In the congenial atmosphere of Palo Alto he is at present engaged in writing a book on psychology. He has made interesting experiments that furnish the material for his tome, which will not be finished until after the marriage next month. Miss Atherton is clever and a thorough student of Shakespeare. It was thought at one time she would choose a stage career, but following the wishes of her relatives she relinquished the idea. Most of her time is spent with her aunt, Mrs. Edward Eyre, who is the sister of her father, Faxon Atherton. She is closely related to Mrs. Percy Moore of Menlo Park, whose mother was an Atherton, and to Mrs. J. L. Rathbone, also an Atherton, whose late husband was at one time American consul general in Paris. He was the uncle of Gerald Rathbone, who married Miss Josseleyn. Those interested in relationships may trace the various ramifications.

Our Ungallant Blades

Occasionally it becomes my task to reprimand the young society blades. I do it more in sorrow than in anger, knowing full well that most of them are inexperienced souls, suffering from the thoughtlessness of youth and cast before their proper time into the maelstrom—shall I say?—of our social pool. This time I must be a trifle severe. Some of our most considerate hostesses confide to me that their patience is taxed beyond endurance by the impoliteness of our ungallant boys. They tell me that the youths who are invited to their dinners in advance of the smart assemblies frequently forget all about the hospitality they have enjoyed as soon as they pass to the ballroom. Some of them do not even dance with the ladies with whom they have dined; a great many ignore the unwritten rule which bids them offer themselves as supper partners. The result is that young women who have put themselves out to entertain the young men at dinner are neglected when the supper hour comes. This is deplorable; it will never do. Our reputation for gallantry is at stake—or it would be more correct to say, our reputation for ordinary good breeding. I trust that the young men who have offended in this way—and I have a number of them in mind—will mend their manners. If they persist in their transgressing they will find themselves extremely unpopular and will have only themselves to blame.

The Bride's Bouquet

"No fortunate maiden grabbed the exquisite bridal bouquet that Miss Elizabeth Newhall carried at the moment she became Mrs. Arthur Chesebrough Wednesday evening. For Mrs. Chesebrough held to the beautiful shower of white orchids and lilies of the valley enmeshed in tulle and satin ribbon. Thus she established a precedent," etc. Surprise that sprang from two sources was the emotion that swayed my bosom when I read this in one of the morning papers. In the first place I was surprised at the incongruous idea and the vulgar image evoked by the word "grabbed." Society maidens never "grab" anything. They are too dainty, too restrained, too well brought up. Women "grab" things at bargain counters, I am told; but not at fashionable weddings. When I had finished wondering whether that sentence had passed through the hands of the sporting editor, I gave myself up to surprise that any chronicler of fashionable doings could make such a mistake about an important event as to state that Mrs. Chesebrough had established a precedent by keeping her bridal bouquet. For, of course, the Newhall-Chesebrough wedding was a very important event and it behooves us to get all the facts right. Mrs. Chesebrough did not hold to the bouquet. She threw it, in accordance with the time-honored custom at big weddings, and it was caught, not "grabbed," by Miss Smith, the charming daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Smith. Speaking of bouquets, Mrs. Lorenzo Avenali, who was Miss Linda Cadwalader, the cousin of Mrs. Chesebrough, did not throw hers, because she had a very quiet wedding and it is not customary to part with the bridal bouquet at a quiet wedding. There were no attendants at that wedding and the bridal party did not exceed a dozen persons. But Mrs. Avenali did a very graceful thing. She sent her bouquet to her aunt, Mrs. Robert N. Graves, who has been ill for the last three weeks and was unable to attend either of the weddings.

An Interesting Engagement

Although surmised by their intimates, the announcement of the engagement of Miss Ruth Sadler and Bertrand Lyle York this week nevertheless occasioned the little flutter of excitement and the ejaculations of pleased surprise that are to be expected when the betrothed are popular members of the exclusive inner shrine. With her admirers legion, Miss Sadler has kept society, her close friends and last but not least, her many suitors "guessing" as to her final decision. The announcement of the engagement to the Oakland business man Sunday set at rest all doubts as to the lucky man who held her heart, and now both bride- and bridegroom-elect are being showered with the best wishes of countless friends. Miss Sadler's family is prominent socially. She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Sadler of Alameda, and the sister of Mrs. Lewis Risdon Mead, who has made her home at the Fairmont Hotel for several winters. Miss Sadler is a stunning girl of the Titian type. She is chic in appearance and wears a "fad" or up-to-date creation as few girls can. She has been courted by the army set, in which have been several of her most devoted admirers. Mr. York is a graduate of the University of California and a member of the Sigma Nu fraternity. He is popular in the business and social world. The marriage of the couple will be solemnized early in the fall.

The Miracle Plays at Stanford

It seems a good many years now since the English Club at Stanford gave its delightful representations of "The Knight of the Burning Pestle" and "Every Man in His Humour." All who had the good fortune to be present at these quaint revivals went away full of hope that there might be many more such affairs at the university. But the English Club turned its attention to other and more modern activities and the Beaumont-Fletcher and Jonson plays were stored in the mind as two most interesting memories in a class by themselves. Now however the English Club has returned to the ancient drama for the inspiration of its activities and we are to have another intellectual treat. On Friday night, February 3, and on Saturday afternoon, February 4, in the Assembly Hall of the University the club will present three old English miracle plays dealing with the Nativity, "The Salutation," "The Second Shepherd's Play" and "The Three Kings." Two of these have never been given in this country before, so the venture has an unusual literary and dramatic significance. They will have also a great musical interest, for the old Latin hymns and the charming folk songs which were popular features of the old Moralities will be rendered with strict adherence to fifteenth-century traditions. In setting and costumes the plays will also be faithful to the period in which they were composed. Here is an event of considerable importance. It remains to be seen whether our cultivated people will appreciate it. I am optimistic enough to believe that they will. Tickets may be had by writing Miss Ruth Sampson at Stanford University.

Fountain in front of Hotel Green, Pasadena

Teakwood Interior for the Frank Havens Home

The beautiful residence of Mr. Frank L. Havens of the Realty Syndicate of Oakland is now nearing completion. It is situated among the Piedmont Hills and the interior is finished entirely in teakwood. This is the most costly of cabinet woods known to the world. Its grain is very delicate and beautiful and while it is a hard wood, it is worked comparatively easily. The expensiveness of teakwood puts it in a class by itself and a house finished in this wood represents the highest expression of exclusive architectural elegance. In England this fact is recognized more than in the United States and the interiors of most of the great houses of England are finished in teak.

A pleasurable announcement to music lovers is that of the forthcoming concert of the Mansfeldt Club, scheduled for Wednesday evening, February 1, at Century Hall. This little club is now in its seventh year of existence and can lay claim to some creditable achievements in piano music, notably that of having given first hearings here to a goodly number of important compositions, both ancient and modern, which have always been rendered in true artistic fashion. The Misses Hjelte, Ferguson, Willcox and Wilson will furnish the interesting program for the coming concert.

San Francisco arrivals at the Angelus Hotel,
Los Angeles, include: E. O. Brandeis, Geo. W.
Hinke and wife, S. E. Busser, T. W. and Mrs.
H. M. Jeffreys, J. P. Templeman, Julius Heyman,

"The Girl in the Taxi"

By Edward F. O'Day

It would be incorrect to say that "The Girl in the Taxi" is a suggestive play. A suggestive play is a play containing situations and lines which suggest lewd thoughts. But "The Girl in the Taxi" doesn't suggest lewd thoughts; it expresses them. Its situations are quite frank and its lines are outspoken. It doesn't call a spade a spade, because that is not the business of the playwright; but it shows you the spade stuck in the dirt and erases any erroneous impression you may have about a spade being a drawing-room ornament or a bit of library furniture. The word "adultery" is never once mentioned in it, but you are given visual proof that such a sin as adultery exists. There is no reference to what Kipling calls the oldest profession in the world; but you are shown beyond the possibility of a doubt that that profession is still popular in New York. You are not asked to infer that there are places in New York conducted for the purpose of allowing a man to break his marriage vows. Far from it. You are taken to one of these places and initiated in its secrets. And why all this? Simply to make you laugh. Perhaps you have never realized the humor of the ten commandments. Maybe you think that Moses was a serious writer. The chances are that you never thought of him as the Rabelais of his generation and his two tablets of stone as the most side-splitting of his jokes. "The Girl in the Taxi" will correct your misconceptions on these points. It will prove to you that adultery is one of the merriest jests in the world; that the cuckold is a scream; that the innocent wife is the funniest thing ever; and that the prurience of salad days is a phenomenon to chortle over. You see, "The Girl in the Taxi" is a play with a mission. It preaches the gospel according to the Tenderloin. It calls on the good to change their ways; it bids the repentant sinner repent; it tells you to laugh at virtue or be laughed at for your old-fogginess. It is very much up to date. Its most piquant scene, its rip-roaring climax shows father and son discovering each other in a place of assignation. It indicates just what father and son should do under such mirthful conditions. Paternal discipline exacts a promise that sonny will not tell mother; filial piety extracts a roll of bills from the old man. Could anything be more delicious? Could twentieth century humor imagine a more convulsing situation? Could the modern relations between father and son be more drolly indicated? What son would not have such a liberal father? What father would not be proud of such a promising son? But how about the wife and mother? Don't for a moment worry about her. She discovers all about the lark in the last act and proves herself the fit wife of such a husband, the proper mother for such a son. She tells her darling boy to her bosom and lets on that she is rather pleased with the old man. She's true sport, is that wife and mother. Too bad the playwright left her out of his big second act. Why not confront the whole family with one another? Why not squeeze the last drop of juice from that pippin of a climax? But let us leave something for other playwrights. The field is too large for one to cover. All the laugh-making possibilities of the most piquant of the deadly sins—an old-fashioned term—can not be exhausted in one entertainment. There is still there for an army of dramatists. Let them labor on until we cry "enough." And, of course, we will cry nothing of the sort. We like this sort of thing. It puts us on good terms with our pleasures. It makes us tender of our own frailties. It teaches us—this play with a mission—to laugh at our peccadilloes. Heaven knows, some of us have been ashamed of them, have felt the twinge of the old-fashioned conscience, have tried, feebly too often ineffectually, to pluck what we thought were weeds from the rank soil of our weaknesses. Let there be no more of that. Let us joyride with "The Girl in the Taxi." When the reckoning comes we may be able to cheat the chauffeur.

Charming Comic Opera

"The Chocolate Soldier" ought to satisfy the long felt want for modern comic opera, for that's what it is from its first pretty solo to its last tuneful ensemble. There are duets and trios enough to satisfy the most exacting comic opera lover, and there are not a few that linger in the ear. As to the book it is the brightest, the sprightliest that has served to inspire a composer since the days when Gilbert was working in harness with Sir Arthur Sullivan. Which is not surprising since it follows pretty closely George Bernard Shaw's play "Arms and the Man." Much of the dialogue is Shaw's own and it abounds in clever conceits of language and the most delicious sarcasms. On the whole the performance is one of exceptional merit. The company is not direct from Broadway, but this is a circumstance not to be lamented inasmuch as it is up to the best New York standard. There are some members of this company so good to look upon, so well equipped with comic opera talent that if to Broadway they are not unknown then that great throbbing thoroughfare is as much to be compassionated as themselves. Antoinette Kopetsky, the prima donna, sings excellently and is pretty, graceful and sweet, and Ilon Bergere is as dainty devilish a Dresden China soubrette as one ever sees, with quite a unique personality. Margaret Crawford is an excellent contralto and Frank Belcher's is another of the melodious voices in this tuneful company, while Edmond Mulcahy is as funny an old roue as ever made an audience laugh by his ceaseless pursuit of youthful beauty. The chorus is nimble, pretty and lively and the scenery and costuming are brilliant and artistic.

A Prodigy in Knickers

Little Pepito Arriola, the boy pianist, is certainly a prodigy. One may say that of him in no invidious sense. Every child preternaturally gifted is a prodigy and Arriola is such a child. He possesses an abnormal power, the divine power of the poet, developed to a degree that it reaches in ordinary mortals, who are favored with it, only after they have reached maturity. In other words Pepito Arriola is a marvel of precocity. He is even more wonderful than the poet who before his fourteenth year composes an exquisite sonnet revealing subtle thought. Precocious lads have done that, but it is not so difficult to acquire a familiarity with the technique of poetic forms as to master the technique of the piano. Pepito Arriola proved the other evening at Christian Science Hall that he is a virtuoso of the piano. Which is going some. Indeed his virtuosity is more surprising than his apparent understanding of Beethoven's "Waldstein," and some of Chopin's preludes, for the sensitiveness of his soul, his feeling, his sympathy—in short the poetry of him is a gift, whereas his mechanical dexterity is the result of concentration, perseverance and industry. These are also gifts but they do not always produce results. Arriola's performance fills an audience with delight not by reason of his precocity but by reason of his ability to communicate his own feeling.

"Sweet Kitty Bellairs"

In response to popular request, the Alcazar announces David Belasco's beautiful costume play, "Sweet Kitty Bellairs," as its offering for the coming week. This will be its second revival in the Sutter-street theater, the tremendous hit made by Evelyn Vaughan in the title part being mostly responsible for both repetitions, although the acting of Bertram Lytell and the other principal people, the elaborate scenic effects, the luxurious costumery and the bright dialogue and cleverly drawn situations of the play itself must be considered as important factors. Belasco found his inspiration for "Sweet Kitty Bellairs" in Egton Castle's charming tale, "The Bath Comedy," and the play adheres with unusual fidelity to the plan of the novel. Three of the scenes are laid at Bath, the English Spa made famous by Beau Brummel, Beau Nash and other foppish celebrities of the Gainsborough period.

"The Chocolate Soldier" for Another Week

As the witty George Bernard Shaw has long been of great assistance in providing the world with epigrams and aphorisms, so is "The Chocolate Soldier" at the Savoy adding new catch-phrases and repartee to the daily speech of San Francisco. This charm of the opera is found to be doubled in the merry tunefulness supplied by

CARRIE STARR

Oscar Straus which carries along the liveliness of the piece without lapse of interest or amusement. It is a true comic opera with the sparkle supposedly lost when the generation of Offenbach, Suppe and Sir Arthur Sullivan passed. Mr. Whitney has provided a cast of singers possessed of great ability and the splendid Whitney Opera Comique Orchestra, under the baton of Director John Lund, adds much to the musical brilliance of the production. "The Chocolate Soldier" will begin its second and last week this Sunday evening, with the usual matinees on Thursday and Saturday.

Sigmund Beel's Violin Recitals

Sigmund Beel, a California violin virtuoso who has been "making good" for the last fifteen years in Europe, will give two concerts at Christian Science Hall under the management of Will Greenbaum. The first of these is announced for next Thursday night, February 2, when with the assistance of Gyula Ormay, accompanist, the virtuoso will offer a sonata by Handel, a concerto by Vieuxtemps, a sonata by Bach and other important numbers. The second concert is announced for Sunday afternoon, February 5, with an entirely new program including novelties by Esposito, Novacek and Kosloff. Seats will be ready Monday morning at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, where complete programs may be obtained.

Another Week of "The Girl in the Taxi"

Beginning next Monday "The Girl in the Taxi" will enter upon the second week of its engagement at the Columbia. The only matinee performances are given on Saturday. The next attraction at the Columbia will be the notable London and New York fantastical musical production "The Arcadians" which comes here with one of the strongest companies ever heard in a light musical production in America.

Pepito Arriola's Concert

Pepito Arriola, the Spanish musical prodigy, will play at Christian Science Hall this Sunday afternoon, January 29. The box office will be open at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s until half past five Saturday afternoon and at the hall Sunday after ten. On this occasion the wonderful lad will play a Beethoven sonata, a group of Chopin works, Leschetizky's "Octave Study," "Tocata," by Jonas, a gavotte by Gluck-Brahms, and Liszt's "St. Francis Walking on the Waves."

New Book Play at Ye Liberty

Next Monday evening Manager Bishop will offer at his Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, the initial performance in the West of "The Marriage of William Ashe," the play made from the novel of that name in which Miss Grace George achieved a notable New York success several years ago. The author of the novel, Mrs. Humphrey Ward, is well known to readers of fiction as a writer of great intellectual power. In preparing "The Marriage of William Ashe" for presentation on the stage she had the assistance of Margaret Mayo, the author of "Polly of the Circus" and other successful plays. Together they have turned out an excellent play, one that is said to do the novel full justice. The scenes are laid in London and in Venice at the present day and the story is interestingly told. Muriel Hope as Lady Kitty and Sydney Ayres as Ashe have the leading roles and the usual adequate cast and scenic surroundings will be provided. "Brewster's Millions" is announced to follow.

A Skit the King Liked at the Orpheum

Harry Tate's English company will present their famous comedy "Motoring" at the Orpheum next week. The late King Edward who was a seasoned playgoer and keenly interested in automobiling said that "Motoring" was one of the most amusing entertainments he had ever enjoyed. John Neff, the Brain Storm Comedian and Carrie Starr, "The Telephone Girl" will contribute an entertaining skit. Madame Vallecita's Leopards will be interesting. These ferocious beasts present a marvelous exhibition of animal training including musical stunts. Hugh Lloyd,

King of the Air on his "cord elastique" will be a novel attraction. Next week will be the last of Charles B. Lawlor and his daughters, The Victoria Four, Borani and Nevaro, and Clayton White and Marie Stuart in George V. Hobart's slang classic "Cherie."

Auto Notes

The Pioneer Automobile Company just made sale of a 4-cylinder Lakewood Lozier Car to A. W. C. Penoyer, a well-known lumberman of Loma, Cal. This will be the first car in the Lozier class to invade that part of the country. A. Penoyer desired to purchase the very best car he could get and he selected the Lozier after a careful investigation of all the cars on the market.

E. A. Boyer of the Consolidated Motor Car Company has just returned from a tour to Dixon in a Pope Hartford Car. While gone Boyer investigated the automobile situation in that section of the state and reports trade this year particularly bright. The recent rains promise bountiful crops and the farmers are consequently figuring more than ever on automobile investments. Boyer declares that the better-to-do ranchers are taking unusual interest this season in cars of the high class as the Pope Hartford.

Even more with aeroplanes than with automobiles, accessories play an important part in the machines' successes. This is due to several reasons, the most important being the exceedingly high rate of speed at which the motor must be running at all times. This same reason attaches much importance to the planes' lubrication. Carbonized cylinders, here, would be especially disastrous. Because of this, George P. Moore, Pacific Coast representative for the New York Lubricating Oil Company, attaches much importance to the fact that out of the fifteen professional drivers competing in the local meet, thirteen were using Monogram Oil. The two not using this lubricant, because of peculiar construction and requisites of their engines, are compelled to use motor oil.

The Frank K. Mott Company of Oakland has been using a Rambler car for some time in connection with their real estate business, and have received what they declare record service from the Diamond tires with which it is equipped.

W. M. Phelps, Pacific Coast representative of the Pope Manufacturing Company, is in town, having just come from a visit throughout the Northwest. Mr. Phelps reports that the call made upon the Pope factory this season by the West for Pope Hartford cars has never been equaled in past years.

Among the new model commercial vehicles which are demanding attention at the Eastern Automobile Show are the new Cartercar trucks with 1500 pounds rating. These cars have the same friction drive transmission as the Cartercar pleasure cars and they have resulted from an extensive study of commercial vehicle requisites.

According to advices received by the local branch of the Diamond Rubber Co., A. H. Cogswell of Seattle owns an Autocar weighing 2,600 pounds on which he uses Diamond Bolt-on Type tire. Three of the tires which came as a part of the car's original equipment are still on the machine, the fourth having been removed only after it had given about 12,000 miles of service. This tire which was removed had not suffered a single puncture. Of the three remaining tires one has been retreaded and is, according to Mr. Cogswell's statement, still in first class condition. The other two have never been retreaded and still look good for a great deal more service.

W. H. Durphy, local distributor of the Chase Motor Wagon, is among the dealers who went East last week to attend the automobile shows. While gone Durphy will study the commercial vehicle situation.

"The Doctor's Christmas Eve"

Though the two books are independent of each other, in order to fully appreciate James Lane Allen's "The Doctor's Christmas Eve," the reader will do well to familiarize himself with "The Bride of the Mistletoe," which was issued a year ago. Neither book is a novel in the accepted sense though both are fiction. A third volume, "The Christmas Tree," to be issued later, will complete the cycle. The scenes are laid in the blue grass region of Kentucky and concern the lives of two households, that of Professor Ouseley and that of Dr. Birney. Each family consists of the husband and wife, and two children, boy and girl, of indefinite age, but somewhere below the dividing line between childhood and adolescence. Dr. Birney and Professor Ouseley had been boyhood companions and manhood friends. Each was a scion of old Kentucky stock, but though Dr. Birney had deliberately chosen as his lot that of a country doctory in order that he might always remain attached to the ancestral soil, Professor Ouseley was now about to sell his homestead and accept a chair in a northern university, so this was the last Christmas which he and his were to spend amongst old scenes. In "The Bride of the Mistletoe" we were introduced into the intimate confidence of the Ouseley home where the Professor, after having prepared for his wife's pleasure and interest a history of the Christmas tree and its symbolic character, is urged to admit that now, after long years of harmonious marriage, the first ardor of his love has cooled, while she is still as much in love with him as at first. To her it is a tragic revelation which, at first, would seem to justify any extreme of conduct on her part, but common sense restrains her and both take up their round of duties and dependences, making the best of the inevitable. "The Doctor's Christmas Eve" concerns the same day and date, but this time it is the Birney household secret that is laid bare. It was Dr. Birney's misfortune to have fallen in love with his friend's wife, never with his own, though he gave her every other allegiance. He married in part because it was the thing naturally expected of a doctor in that time and place, partly in the hope that he would thus cure himself of his disease. Mrs. Birney soon discovered the truth of the situation, and like a sensible, good woman of her day and generation, she, too, made the best of things, devoting herself to her household and doing all that lay in her power to further the doctor's labors, giving him a calm and peaceful home and not distracting him with needless annoyance. It is the children of the two households that occupy the stage in the second story, told chiefly through their comments and conversations and revealing an almost uncanny precocity at times. Dr. Birney who has been looking forward with a dreadful interest to the time when his children will understand—or perhaps misunderstand—the conditions which govern their household, makes the discovery, on this morning of Christmas Eve, when Herbert and Elsie are about to set out for a visit to their playmates, that the boy had already arrived at that age of indiscretion, and the lad's admiration for his father and desire to be like him has already been influenced by subtle suggestion. The four children make an interesting study, the hereditary traits showing in strengthened or modified form. Elsie Birney is practical and decidedly selfish, inclined to dominate over her more imaginative little brother, while Herbert in his intimate conversations with his father as he drives about with him in his buggy, reveals himself as one of the most loveable and human children in the range of fiction. Harold Ouseley, still at the age when he loves to play soldier and to imagine himself some great conqueror, demanding "plenty of gore" in his stories, yet has decided opinions on the subject of unrestricted immigration and the dying out of the race, while his gentle sister Elizabeth evidently has inherited the poetic strain from the sometimes stern Professor. It would seem almost as if Mr. Allen had entered a protest against the feminization of families for though the mothers in both instances are excellent women, doing all that duty and affection can demand of them, they yet have but a small share in the development of their children. He has entered a decided, though wordless protest against the vulgar indecency of rushing to a newspaper and a divorce court as soon as a woman discovers that married life is not one prolonged ecstasy, and whatever emphasis is put upon the value of the suggestion of strained relationship in the minds of the children it is equally certain that there would be the counter-suggestion of dutiful patience and decent reticence which even the selfish and rather flippanant little Elsie would receive some profit from. The children have all reached that stage of development, which comes earlier to every generation when they reject the myths and age-old superstitions and this year all four are bent on finding the key and at midnight descending upon the busy parents intent on decorating the Christmas tree. They carry out their plan of surprise, but the Professor is ready for them and the manner in which he discourses with them, half entering into their sophistication but at the same time, maintaining his pretence of mystery, is one of the prettiest conceptions of all the lore of Christmas fiction. Taking the two books together, whether one regards the story as a Christmas fantasy, a picture of life under its pleasant conditions in the blue grass region, or a protest against the mad whirl which sends the individual members of a household on a wild flight to all points of the compass under any excuse or none, this is something that one would be sorry indeed to have missed. It is a pity that good work has not the capacity to inspire the paper it is printed on with some definite color, or luminosity, so that, out of the tons of spoiled white paper that drop from the press the comparatively few really good books of perpetual value can be segregated at a glance. From the Macmillan Company

"Didn't you promise never to do it again?"

"Yes, sir."

"And I said I'd whip you if you did, didn't I?"

"Yes, pa; but as I didn't keep my promise I won't hold you to yours."

A $2,000,000 Corporation

You are invited to become a member of a two-million-dollar corporation. The reasons for establishing the Company, its objects, purposes and prospects of profit, are set forth in a booklet we will be pleased to send you on request.

The contract for the purchase of the 724-acre tract, now owned by the heirs of the late Adolph Sutro, has been assigned to the RESIDENTIAL DEVELOPMENT COMPANY OF SAN FRANCISCO, and the opportunity for making what in our opinion will be not less than 300 per cent on the investment, is now open to you.

To have the title to this property remain in one ownership, and that a strong Company, which will improve it on broad and esthetic, and yet practicable and profitable lines, has so appealed to a number of the most influential citizens that they have subscribed in sums ranging from $5,000 to $50,000 each.

Any information you wish will be cheerfully furnished by any one of the real estate firms who are co-operating in this deal, and whose names appear in this announcement. It will afford us a pleasure to show you over the property whenever it is agreeable and convenient to you.

You will make a profitable investment by sending in your subscription at once. Subscriptions do not become effective unless 9,000 shares of the stock are sold prior to February 27, 1911.

PAYMENTS

$10 a share payable on or before January 31.

$90 a share (final payment) payable when 9,000 shares are sold, which presumably will be no later than February 27, 1911. All payments are to be made to the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco.
